INTRODUCTION

'GREEK lyric poetry' is a conventional catch-all term covering more or less all the Greek poetry of the centuries down to 350 BC apart from epic, didactic, and other verse composed in hexameters, and drama. It cannot be considered a single genre. It is commonly subdivided into melic poetry, elegy, and iambus. But this division is not without its problems.

'Melic' means 'for song'; but song covers such a wide range, from little personal ditties to solemn choral cantatas, that this is still far from being a unified category. In any case, it is not really logical to distinguish 'melic' poetry from elegy and iambus, since most elegy was sung, and some iambus.

Elegy, at least, is easy to define. It is defined by its metre, the elegiac couplet, and whatever is composed in this metre for recitation or song is classed as elegy. It should be pointed out that the term does not carry the mournful associations that it has in the context of English literature.

As for iambus, it sounds as if it might be another metrical category, and indeed much of the verse that belongs under this heading is in iambic metre—much, but not all. The metre that we call iambic was so named because it was typical of 'iambus', not the other way round. 'Iambus' originally designated the entertaining monologues and songs performed at certain popular festivals of Demeter and Dionysus, which were typically ludicrous, scurrilous, or bawdy.

The general term 'lyric' ought to mean 'accompanied by the lyre'. But this again is inexact. It is true that most of this poetry was sung or recited to an instrumental accompaniment, but the instrument was not always a lyre. In many cases it was the aulos, a sort of oboe, two of which were played at once by a single player (the aulete), as was the custom with this instrument all over the ancient Near East. This is the instrument that countless writers on the Greeks have erroneously called a flute. The flute was not altogether unknown in antiquity, but the reader may take it that every reference he has ever seen to flutes or flute-girls in an ancient Greek context ought to have been to oboes and oboists. Besides the lyre and the aulos, which were always the principal Greek instruments, we should also mention the harp, which is referred to by a few poets (Sappho, Alcaeus, Anacreon) and was presumably sometimes used by them as an alternative to the lyre.

A solo singer accompanied himself on the lyre or harp, or was accompanied by an aulete. Elegy in particular was commonly sung to the auloi, in convivial gatherings where every guest was expected to sing something and a male or female aulete (a slave, or hired) was on hand to provide the musical accompaniment for those who were unable to play a stringed instrument for themselves. Choral song, which had its place mainly at festivals or other special occasions, was accompanied in some cases by the lyre, in others by the auloi, in others, apparently, by lyre and auloi simultaneously. In all kinds of song, the instrumental accompaniment served principally to support the vocal melody, with little embellishment.

To the modern reader the term 'lyric' may suggest a particular kind of literary style or mood. The body of Greek verse that we put together under this label, however, is very diverse in character. It includes every kind of song, with the exceptions of epic and drama already noted; and song is, after all, a medium almost as wide and varied in scope as speech. Epic and tragic poetry are focused on the mythical past. Some of this 'lyric' poetry too consists of mythic narrative, and allusions to the old myths are liable to appear anywhere. But what we have here above all is the poetry of the present, the poetry in which people express their feelings and ideas about all their current concerns: their personal loves or enmities, their hopes, fears, and complaints, matters affecting their circle of friends or their whole town. It is all social poetry, in the sense that although some poets looked forward to their work being preserved for the future, it was all intended initially for oral delivery (whether sung or recited) before an audience, private or public, in a specific setting. It was always a medium of communication to others, not a matter of poets committing their secret thoughts to paper to be published at some later time if at all. Even where a poem is nominally addressed to a single individual, or takes the form of a prayer addressed to a god, we can assume that it was in fact intended to be heard by a group.

Much of this poetry is of high quality; some of the poets counted among the finest that Greece produced. It is our misfortune that most of their work has perished. We have some complete poems, but for the most part there are only fragments, of varying extent and completeness, preserved either on remnants of ancient papyrus rolls or as quotations embedded in the texts of later prose writers. All that was transmitted through the Middle Ages in its own manuscript tradition was a collection of the Victory Odes of Pindar and a collection of elegiac verse labelled as 'Theognis', consisting in fact of anthologized excerpts from various poets of whom Theognis was only one. However, the situation is better than it used to be. New papyrus fragments continue to be published, and this is one area of Greek literature in which our knowledge has increased significantly over the years. But we still have only a small fraction of what circulated in antiquity.

In this volume I have translated all the surviving remains of iambic, elegiac, and melic poetry down to about 450 BC, except for the works of Pindar and Bacchylides, who require volumes to themselves; I omit only such fragments as are too small or broken to convey any intelligible image or idea. Many of the lesser fragments that I do translate may perhaps be thought too uninformative to justify their inclusion. But collectively, I think, they do help to fill out our picture of the range of each poet's subject-matter and poetic manner.

I have taken 450 BC as the notional limiting date because the poetry of the succeeding period is somewhat different in character, more self-conscious, less spontaneous in feeling and expression; there are no very major figures among its poets. The earlier poetry, on the other hand, apart from the intrinsic beauty that characterizes much of it—only imperfectly conveyed by a translation, but I hope not altogether obscured—is of particular interest because so much of it shows us real Greeks speaking their minds in a wide range of circumstances. We have virtually no contemporary prose literature, and we rely on lyric above all for evidence of the beliefs, attitudes, and opinions most prevalent in those times.

It is also an important source of information about historical events. Ancient authors themselves, writers such as Aristotle and Plutarch, depended largely on Tyrtaeus for their understanding of happenings in seventh-century Sparta, and on Solon for their understanding of Athenian affairs half a century later; we have the passages that these writers saw fit to quote from the poets as evidence. Various other wars, political crises, and revolutions are intermittently lit up by the lyric fragments, and even where these add nothing to our knowledge of what happened, they may give us a valuable insight into the emotions aroused by the events, the hopes and forebodings, the exultation or the chagrin. The most recent additions to the corpus, a series of papyrus fragments from elegies of Simonides, include our first extended contemporary account of the days leading up to the Battle of Plataea: a clearly poeticized account, but precious to the historian.

I have arranged the material on a broadly chronological basis, under the rubrics 'seventh century', 'seventh to sixth century', and so on. We have one two-line fragment that is attributed to a poet as early as the second half of the eighth century, Eumelus of Corinth, but there is room for doubt as to whether it is really so old. Otherwise, the earliest poets represented belong to the middle of the seventh century. They are the elegists Callinus of Ephesus and Tyrtaeus of Sparta, and the iambic poets ('iambographers') Archilochus of Paros and Semonides of Amorgos.

Archilochus ranked in antiquity as one of the greatest of poets, worthy to be named beside Homer and Hesiod. His native island of Paros in the middle of the Aegean was one of the chief centres of the worship of Demeter, goddess of agriculture, and in association with this cult there was a local tradition of iambus: scurrilous and erotic recitations and songs performed at particular festivals, originally, no doubt, with the idea of promoting fertility by means of explicit sexuality. Certainly, explicit sexual (and in some authors scatological) material was admitted by the iambographers to a degree that no other branch of literature tolerated apart from comedy, which was itself in origin associated with fertility rituals. In iambus, sex and scatology typically appear in the framework of first-person narratives. The speaker or singer (possibly costumed in the role of a stock figure) regaled the audience with accounts of extravagant orgies or other escapades in which he claimed to have taken part. He named women whom he had seduced or who had eagerly given themselves to him. If these were real women, the allegations must have been exceedingly embarrassing and shaming to them and their families, and there are stories of iambographers' victims being driven to suicide by the publicity; but there is something to be said for the view that the persons named were in some cases fictitious. Archilochus' iambi were particularly concerned with one Lycambes and his two daughters, one of whom was called Neobule. The reader will notice several mentions of them, and will easily identify other fragments as belonging to the iambic genre.

But by no means all of Archilochus' poetry can be ascribed to this genre. Much of it represents his reactions to current events, military, political, and personal. There is affectionate banter with friends, bristly remonstrance with enemies, satirical comment on public figures, solemn lament for men lost at sea, vivid references to impending or recent battles. The variety of tone is wide, but Archilochus always comes across as a man of spirit. A number of fragments refer to Thasos, the north Aegean island that was colonized by the Parians: Archilochus spent part of his life there, and was involved in fighting with Thracian tribes on the nearby mainland.

Semonides of Amorgos (not to be confused with the more famous Simonides of Ceos) is a much more indistinct figure. A few of the lesser fragments indicate that his iambus too included elements of obscene narrative. The two main fragments, however, might be put under the heading of popular philosophy. One of them, the so-called 'satire on women', is the longest piece of non-hexameter verse that we have in Greek from before the fifth century. Its 118 lines are almost a complete poem, with only a few lines lost at the end. The generally unfavourable picture of women reflects an attitude that was common. But we should remember that the piece was designed as a conventional entertainment. The theme of woman as a plague appeared in other iambographers too, and it should be compared to routine jokes about mothers-in-law in the more vulgar kind of modern comedy rather than being seen as an expression of personal bitterness.

Callinus of Ephesus and Tyrtaeus of Sparta, although they lived on opposite sides of the Aegean, wrote elegies of very similar character. Both use the medium to exhort their fellow citizens to fight to the death in defence of their community, winning glory and averting shame. These poems, perhaps more than Homer, give us an idea of what it felt like to be a young man in early Greece, faced with the prospect of going into battle—both the physical dangers and the moral pressures.

Callinus' audience seem to be unprepared for war, perhaps enjoying their symposium. Tyrtaeus, on the other hand, speaks as if his hearers are ready drawn up on the battlefield, and it is not impossible that this was the actual situation. We know that three centuries later, when Tyrtaeus was an established classic, Spartan armies were made to listen to recitations of his works. The conflict for which at least some of his poems were composed was the Second Messenian War. Messene, the fertile country beyond the mountains to the west of Sparta, had been brought under Spartan domination two generations previously, in the late eighth century, and it had now risen in revolt. The Spartans succeeded in subduing it again, but not without some difficulty. At the same period they were suffering from internal political troubles. The poor found themselves without sufficient land, and clamoured for a redistribution. The authority of the city's two kings and of the council of elders was threatened. Here again we see Tyrtaeus playing a role as propagandist. In a poem to which later writers gave the title Eunomia ('Law and Order') he reminded the people of the divine authority on which the constitution rested, and he called for obedience to the rulers and an end to discord.

Later in the seventh century we find Mimnermus of Smyrna again using elegy to rouse his people to the fight, perhaps against the Lydians, who had attacked Smyrna before and, about 600 BC, succeeded in destroying it. But Mimnermus was better remembered for poetry celebrating the delights of love and youth. According to later reports, loved ones of both sexes were named in his poems, and indeed both he and Solon speak of the love of boys and women as if they were complementary. But the more personal parts of his love poetry have not survived, only anthology excerpts containing general reflections on the subject.

Towards the end of the century we encounter our first substantial specimens of choral poetry. They come from the Partheneia (girls' songs) of Alcman, composed for Spartan girls' choruses to sing and dance to at certain festivals, and they give glimpses of a very different side of Spartan life from those that concerned Tyrtaeus. The longest piece (fragment 1) comes from a papyrus in the Louvre which was one of the first Greek literary papyri to be discovered; it was published in 1855. The text indicates that the chorus consists of ten girls and that a religious ceremony of some sort is in progress. It is sometimes thought that the chorus was in competition against another. There are mythological and moralizing passages, and a fair amount about the girls themselves and their finery, with especial praise of the beauty of two who are attending to the sacrifice. One of them is even portrayed as the girls' heart-throb. This was apparently a conventional element in these Spartan Partheneia, as it appears also in a fragment from another one, with a different girl named.

It is in the work of Sappho, of course, that the theme of love between women is most famously in evidence. Most of her songs were composed for private pleasure in her house, where, it seems, a circle of unmarried women or girls regularly made music and sang. The nature of the arrangement is not clear, but the most plausible view is that these young women were entrusted to Sappho by their parents for instruction in music and perhaps also in letters. On occasion they sang in public at weddings or festivals. A certain number of the fragments are from wedding songs or religious performances. But the majority are from more intimate compositions, and concerned with personal matters. There is little mention of men, apart from bridegrooms in the wedding songs. It is very much a women's world that is reflected. When Sappho speaks of the old myths about Troy, they are seen through a woman's eyes. It is Hector's wedding that stirs her imagination, not his prowess on the battlefield; Helen is viewed with some sympathy, as a woman whose priorities were upset by love.

Alcaeus was contemporary with Sappho, and lived in the same town of Mytilene on the island of Lesbos. Yet there is no certain indication of any contact between them. If Sappho's is a woman's world, Alcaeus' is no less decidedly a man's. His songs are mostly composed for drinking-parties with male cronies. There are hymns to gods, celebrations of the pleasures of wine and love (of boys), and, above all, songs about fighting and politics. Like many other Greek towns in the seventh and sixth centuries, Mytilene was going through a period of instability. One leader after another seized power, or was raised to power on a wave of popular support. We hear of successive administrations by Melanchrus, Myrsilus, and Pittacus. Alcaeus belonged to an established landowning family and, in shifting alliances with others of his class, and at one point with a neighbouring foreign power (Lydia), he struggled in opposition to the popular leaders. But the city was out of sympathy with him, and he found himself evicted from his estates and banished to another part of the island.

Theognis of Megara is in some ways a similar figure: a 'squirearch', a man of standing in his city, whose public actions, however, arouse some discontent; a man who sings to his drinking-comrades of his anxieties about the political situation; a man of cliques, who finds himself betrayed by those he trusted, dispossessed of his land in a democratic revolution, an impoverished and embittered exile dreaming of revenge. His allusions to current situations seem best to fit the last decades of the seventh century, though later chroniclers date him in the middle of the sixth. Not all of his elegies were political. Some of them (or, to be more exact, some of the surviving excerpts) contain general moral advice; some are amatory. In all these categories Theognis habitually addresses his poems to his friend Cyrnus, also called Polypaides. The appearance of one or other of these two names is the chief criterion that enables us to identify Theognis' verse among the much larger collection of elegiac excerpts transmitted as his. It is not that an excerpt lacking an address to Cyrnus cannot be by Theognis, but that, as we can see that the collection contains excerpts from Tyrtaeus, Mimnermus, Solon, and others, some as late as the fifth century, it is only prudent to treat as anonymous any piece for which we have no positive indication of authorship. I have accordingly separated 'Theognis' from 'Anonymous Theognidea'. In the latter section I have taken out those pieces which can be ascribed to a named poet, and also the duplications that are a feature of the collection: the same item often appears twice (with some textual divergences), as a result of the conflation of different ancient anthologies.

The anonymous Theognidea have a fascination of their own, even if they cannot be grouped round a single personality. Many of them were clearly composed for the symposium, and many more are on the subject of drinking or making merry. It was the custom in some circles for the guests to be wittily rude to each other, and we see at least one example of this (lines 453-6). Other pieces are reflective or philosophic, even dialectical. Many—especially those gathered at the end of the collection (lines 1231-389)—are love poems, mostly addressed to unnamed boys. The value of the collection as a whole is that it may be taken as a representative cross-section of the elegiac poetry written for sympotic and other social settings in the sixth and early fifth centuries. It is here, out of all the material gathered in this volume, that we come closest to the ordinary man and his views on life, friendship, society, fate, death.

At the end of the seventh century and the beginning of the sixth we encounter the first known Athenian poet: none other than the famous statesman Solon. Much of his verse, like that of Tyrtaeus and Theognis, is concerned with the public affairs of his city. He played an important part in those affairs. Inequalities between rich and poor had produced a critical situation. The misery and resentment of the under-class threatened to erupt in revolution and to throw up some popular dictator, as had happened at Megara and other places. Solon, after passing a series of comments and warnings on these dangers, in poems that evidently circulated well beyond the confines of a private drinking-group, summoned a mass meeting, won its support, and was given powers to frame special laws to ease the situation. They brought some relief, but failed to please everyone, and in subsequent poems we hear Solon passionately defending his actions against more than one set of critics. The eloquence and vivid imagery of his poetry make it easy for us to understand how this man was able to dominate a crowd.

Alcman, Sappho, Alcaeus, Theognis, and Solon all belong under the heading 'seventh to sixth century' because they were (or may have been) active both before and after 600. But the rubric also covers a couple of poets whom we can only date vaguely to the later seventh or the sixth century. They are an obscure iambographer from Selinus in Sicily, one Aristoxenus, of whom a single line survives—quite a long one, it is true—and the author of the comic poem Margites, which was rather implausibly reputed to have been composed by Homer in a rare fit of drollery. It was in an irregular mixture of epic hexameter and iambic lines, and it concerned a ridiculous ninny called Margites and the ludicrous situations that he got himself into. Ancient allusions indicate that the main episode dealt with Margites' wedding night. He had no idea what to do with his bride, until she told him that a scorpion had bitten her between the legs and that the wound could only be healed by the insertion of a man's penis.

The numerous Greek colonies in the west, in Sicily and Italy, naturally produced their own poets, and two major lyricists of the sixth century came from that part of the world: Stesichorus and Ibycus. Stesichorus' poems were narratives on legendary subjects, composed on the most ample scale. We know that one of them, the Oresteia, was divided into at least two books, and a fragment of the Song of Geryon has a numeral in the margin signifying 'line 1300'. These were in effect lyric epics, sung to expansive strophic melodies. It used to be generally assumed that this was choral poetry, but it now seems likely that Stesichorus performed it as a solo singer accompanying himself on the lyre, possibly with a chorus of dancers. His themes included several of Heracles' adventures, various episodes connected with the Trojan War, its antecedents and aftermath, and legends from central Greece. The fifth-century tragedians often drew upon Stesichorus for material and for particular versions of myths.

Ibycus came from Rhegium, the modern Reggio. He is clearly no stranger to the Stesichorean tradition, but his poetry is much more personal in orientation, often concerned with love. In the amatory fragments we see some striking imagery, as well as some rather distasteful baroque conceits. The longest extant piece concludes with praise of Polycrates, son of Aeaces the ruler of Samos, where Ibycus settled down as a court poet. Polycrates himself came to power in about 538, and under him the prestige of Samos reached a height it never attained before or since.

Anacreon too enjoyed the patronage of this Samian dynasty; Aeaces is said to have made him Polycrates' music-teacher. Anacreon, an Ionian from Abdera, must be counted one of the very finest of the lyric poets. No wild outpouring of passion here, but feeling tempered by humour and expressed in little songs of exquisite craftsmanship. Posterity saw Anacreon as the archetypal merry old soul, the cheerful devotee of wine and love, tottering home from the party with garland askew and with a pretty boy to guide him. Many centuries after his death, a new genre of 'Anacreontic' poetry sprang into life. From about the first century of our era down to Byzantine times, poets composed simple sympotic songs in the spirit of Anacreon (as they understood it), in metres derived from his, and in some cases referring to him by name or even adopting his persona. These later Anacreontea exercised a powerful influence on European literature from the sixteenth century onward; until 1834 they were always included in editions of Anacreon's fragments, and it was only by degrees that their spuriousness came to be agreed by all.

Polycrates fell in about 522, and Anacreon spent his latter years at Athens. His patron there was Hipparchus, the younger brother of the dictator Hippias. Other, more avant-garde poets in Hipparchus' circle were Lasus of Hermione, who was interested in musical theory and may actually have invented the word 'music' (mousikē), and Simonides of Ceos, of whom more anon.

A few minor names from the sixth century must be mentioned here. Asius of Samos was mainly significant as an epic poet, but one enigmatic elegiac fragment survives. Demodocus, a caustic wit, came from the small Aegean island of Leros. His habit of introducing his mots with the phrase 'Another from Demodocus' was a satirical borrowing from an earnest moralizing poem in hexameters current in neighbouring Miletus, where successive admonitions began with 'Another from Phocylides'. Practically nothing is known of Pythermus of Teos, or of the iambographer Ananius, who referred to a popular song by Pythermus.

The last of the three major iambographers (the other two being Archilochus and Semonides) is Hippōnax of Ephesus, active towards the end of the sixth century. The traditional iambic element of first-person sexual narrative is well represented in his fragments. But the tone is noticeably different from that in the seventh-century writers of iambus. Hipponax is more obviously setting out to be funny. He presents himself as a vulgar fellow, given to brawling and burglary. His reported adventures are not just erotic but picaresque, sordid, and farcical. The whole way of life that he describes is low-class and shabby. The effect is enhanced by his use of vulgar language, with an admixture of foreign words that were presumably current in the colloquial speech of Ephesus. Just as Archilochus has a favourite enemy, Lycambes, so has Hipponax: it is Bupalus, a sculptor, reputed to have antagonized the poet by caricaturing him. Hipponax claims to have enjoyed wild nights with Bupalus' mistress Ārētē.

The long life of Xenophanes of Colophon easily bridges the sixth and fifth centuries. He is the first poet of Greece (and of the world, I fancy) whose year of birth can be stated more or less exactly. This is because he tells us that he was 25 ('if I can claim to know the truth of it') when he left his Ionian home for a life of wandering through Greece, and it is probable that what uprooted him was the Persian capture of Colophon in about 540. His wanderings have lasted a further 67 years, so he is still writing verse at the age of 92, in about 473 BC. Xenophanes plays a role in histories of philosophy because of his highly radical speculations on cosmology and theology. These he expounded in hexameter verse, which falls outside the scope of the present volume. But the elegiac fragments themselves give a hint of his opinionated and argumentative nature, and of his self-esteem.

Simonides of Ceos, a few years younger than Xenophanes, also attained a ripe old age: he boasts that, octogenarian though he is, he has a matchless memory. In him we encounter a professional lyricist of a new type, a poet who acquires a national reputation and openly trades on it to get custom from everywhere. Hipparchus of Athens has been mentioned as one of Simonides' patrons. He had many others, in Euboea, Thessaly, Aegina, Sparta, Sicily, and Italy—men of wealth and standing, who could afford the high fees he was notorious for charging. It was a pattern to be followed by his nephew Bacchylides and by Pindar. Like them, Simonides composed choral odes celebrating his patrons' victories at the great national sports meetings such as the Olympics. But he composed many other kinds of melic poetry too, as well as elegy. In more than one genre he celebrated the great critical battles of the Persian Wars. These wars gave Greece a new consciousness of national identity, and Simonides was the first poet to give it expression.

After Simonides I have placed another group of minor figures.

Susarion of Megara was cited by Megarian antiquarians to substantiate the claim that comedy was invented at Megara, not at Athens. But the fragment quoted must be assigned to the genus iambus rather than comedy, and the man's date is quite uncertain. Apollodorus was an Athenian choral poet, active around 500 BC. Cydias may have been another, though the evidence is frail. Pratinas of Phlius is somewhat better known, mainly as an early contributor to Athenian tragedy and satyric drama.

After these the reader will come upon an interesting collection of stanzas under the heading Anonymous Party Songs. Numbers 884–908 circulated as a collection in antiquity. They were evidently popular items sung by guests at Athenian symposia in the fifth century. Many of them have the same metrical structure, and were no doubt sung to a particular well-known tune. A number of them celebrate a famous event of the year 514, when Hipparchus—that patron of outstanding poets, but brother of an increasingly unpopular dictator—was assassinated at a public festival by Harmodius and Aristogeiton. Three years later the dictator himself was ousted and democracy was established. As the songs show, these events came to be somewhat run together in the popular memory, as if Hipparchus had been the tyrant and his death had at once brought the regime to an end. The song-book also contained two or three items from identifiable poets (Alcaeus, Praxilla), which I have left out because they appear elsewhere in their due place.

The Praxilla just mentioned was a poetess from Sicyon in the north-east Peloponnese. She was credited on the one hand with songs suitable for the symposium—which might suggest a courtesan—and on the other hand with choral poetry and hymns, which would point rather to a respectable, matronly chorus-leader. It is possible that two different women of the same name have been confused, or else that Praxilla's authorship of the sympotic songs, about which the ancients seem to have entertained some doubts, was a fiction. Another early fifth-century woman poet from the same region, the Argive Telesilla, is more unequivocally portrayed as a lady of standing in her city and a leader of female choruses. Before the Hellenistic age, this was the role in which the woman poet could most naturally emerge into the daylight as a public figure. Sappho too, we recall, had such a role in her society.

Timocreon of Rhodes wrote songs of a rather personal nature. It is not clear for what sort of occasion he wrote them, but he evidently hoped for and to some extent obtained a nation-wide hearing. A couple of his fragments are of historical interest for their references to events of the years c.479–467, and in particular for invective against Themistocles.

The last elegist included in this volume is Euenus of Paros. It must be confessed that the identification of this man and of the fragments to be ascribed to him requires a certain measure of faith. Plato and Aristotle refer to a Parian sophist and rhetorician Euenus, a contemporary of Socrates, and Aristotle quotes verses of his. One of these is virtually identical with a line that appears in the Theognidea in one of three poems addressed to a certain Simonides. It is a reasonable guess that those three poems are by the same poet, and a slightly more risky inference that he was Aristotle's Euenus. But if the Simonides addressed is the famous poet, the author must have been of mature age by about 470, too early for the sophist; and that is the sort of date suggested by the style of the poems and by their presence in the Theognidean collection. It may be that Aristotle confused an older and a younger Euenus. A further complication is that there was at least one, perhaps more than one, later epigrammatist called Euenus. Certain verses cited under this name have to be assigned, as between the various claimants, on rather subjective criteria.

Lamprocles, an Athenian musician, probably flourished a little before the middle of the fifth century. His hymn to Athena is cited by Aristophanes as a 'classic' piece in the good old traditional style. Lamprocles perhaps sang it to his own lyre accompaniment at the great city festival of Athena, the Panathenaea, in the competition for citharodes. The citharode, a professional who sang to the cithara (a grander kind of lyre than the ones used in domestic music-making), was the most highly acclaimed sort of musical performer, admired both for his mastery of the instrument and for his fine singing. The citharodes looked back to Terpander of Lesbos (c.680–650) as the first great exponent of the art, and attributed many achievements to him: increasing the number of the lyre's strings from four to seven, inventing new scales and rhythms, establishing rules of musical form, and so on. Much of this was no doubt constructed by projecting classical citharodes' practices back on to the first famous citharode. Similarly, when Terpander is named as the source of a couple of hymn fragments, we should probably take them to come from a body of 'traditional' pieces that citharodes of the classical period availed themselves of and ascribed collectively to Terpander. There is no good evidence that actual songs of his were handed down.

A few pages of anonymous fragments conclude the volume. Most of them are anonymous because the ancient authors who quote them omit to specify where they are quoting from. But the groups headed 'work songs', 'play songs', and 'ritual songs' fall into a different category. These are the pieces generally labelled 'carmina popularia' in scholarly editions. They were 'popular' in the sense that they were not thought of as belonging to any particular author or performer, but were sung traditionally to accompany certain activities: routine labour, children's games, local religious rituals. They did not circulate in book form, and our knowledge of them is confined to the few that ancient writers chance to quote. These are usually writers of the Hellenistic or Roman period, and we cannot say how old the songs are. Some of them certainly go back to the classical age, and in general they are characterized by a simplicity of language and metre that would not be out of place in the sixth or fifth century. If these actual pieces did not exist so early, they may be taken as samples of a basically timeless category of folk-song that certainly must have existed from the beginning. Even the child Homer, we can assume, played singing games.

The translation

I have tried to produce readable verse translations while rendering as faithfully as possible the thought and the spirit of the originals. This means, for example, reproducing the metaphors and images used in the Greek, so far as they can be made intelligible to the modern reader, and not importing new ones. Minor shifts are occasionally necessary, as when Alcaeus (frag. 351) uses a metaphor from an ancient board game that has no modern equivalent, and speaks of someone 'moving the stone (counter) from the holy line'. The point is that this was a move made only in the last resort, so the appropriate translation will be 'playing his final card'. No one will be misled, I hope, into supposing that the Greeks played cards.

Another necessity sometimes forced upon the translator is the use of words or expressions that have an old-fashioned air, simply because they correspond better than any current idiom to the Greek concept. This arises particularly in moral and ethical contexts. There is a very common set of words in Greek, dikē, dikaïos, adikos, which the student is taught to translate as 'justice, just, unjust'. But these renderings are quite inadequate, as 'justice' in English is a quality of the law, judges, or others in a position to allocate some resource among claimants, whereas dikē is a property of anyone who abides by the law, deals fairly with his neighbours, and so on. The word that best catches it is the biblical-sounding 'righteousness'. Again, the early Greek poets very often contrast the 'good' man (agathos or esthlos) with the 'bad' man (kakos or deilos). In English, 'good' and 'bad' applied to persons refer simply to moral character, unless some further qualification is added (as in 'a good man in a crisis'). But in early Greek the terms refer predominantly to social status, inherited wealth, breeding, or the lack of these, often with the assumption that moral worth is their natural concomitant. In many cases agathos is best represented by a phrase such as 'man of quality', 'man of class', or 'man of worth', and kakos by 'rogue', 'rapsallion', 'bum', 'man of low degree', or the like. It should go without saying that it is not practicable, in a work such as this, always to translate the same word or phrase in the same way; nor have I made any particular effort to do so.

I have tried to give some idea of the metrical variety of the originals. Sometimes I have actually imitated the ancient metres, in so far as it is possible to imitate quantitative measures (based on the contrast of longer and shorter syllables) in a language where the prosodic opposition is between stressed and unstressed elements. For example, the metre of Sappho, fragment 44,

— x — ∪ ∪ — ∪ ∪ — ∪ ∪ — ∪ —

is meant to be reflected in my line

Só the héraId Idaéus arríved with the méssage swíft, and that of Alcaeus, fragment 342,

— u — u u — — u u — — u u — u —

by my

Lét the vine be the first fruit-tree you plánt: óthers can waít their túrn.

In other cases, without attempting to reproduce the original metrical pattern, I have tried to convey some idea of the general effect, for example, by using a strophe of two shorter lines and one longer one where that is the structure of the original. In translating the many poems composed in elégíac couplets, I have usually used iambic lines with alternately six and five stresses, though in a few cases I have used five-stress verses for both lines of the couplet, relying on indentation to indicate the alternation.

It has been an enjoyable task. I do not delude myself that all parts of the end product are likely to give equal pleasure to the reader. But if I have succeeded in opening any eyes, ears, or hearts to some portion of the manifold beauty, wisdom, and wit that shines from these precious remnants of a brilliant culture of long ago, I shall be well content.

NOTE ON THE NUMERATION OF FRAGMENTS

I HAVE given the fragments the numbers that they bear in the scholarly editions currently regarded as standard, namely: for the iambic and elegiac poets, M. L. West, Iambi et Elegi Graeci (2nd edn., Oxford, 1989–92); for the Lesbian poets, E.-M. Voigt, Sappho et Alcaeus (Amsterdam, 1971) (the numbers are nearly all the same as in the older edition of E. Lobel and D. L. Page, Poetarum Lesbiorum Fragmenta (Oxford, 1955) ); for other melic poets, D. L. Page, Poetae Melici Graeci (Oxford, 1962) and Supplementum Lyricis Graecis (Oxford, 1974; numbers prefixed by S). Page's numerations are taken over in M. Davies, Poetarum Melicorum Graecorum Fragmenta (Oxford, 1991), of which one volume has so far appeared, containing Alcman, Stesichorus, and Ibycus. The Theognidea are provided with the continuous line-numbering used in all modern editions.

A row of three dots (. . .) indicates a gap in the preserved text; a row of five dots indicates a single missing line. Words partly or wholly restored by conjecture are enclosed in square brackets.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

C. M. BOWRA's Greek Lyric Poetry (2nd edn., Oxford, 1961) long did duty as the standard survey of this field for English readers. We now have the relevant chapters by various hands in The Cambridge History of Classical Literature, i: Greek Literature (Cambridge, 1985), 117-244, with the extensive bibliographies on pp. 728-46, and a good brief account by E. L. Bowie in The Oxford History of the Classical World (Oxford, 1986), 99-112. H. Fränkel, Early Greek Poetry and Philosophy (New York, 1975), also deserves a warm recommendation. D. A. Campbell, The Golden Lyre (London, 1983), discusses the poets' treatment of a series of themes—love, death, politics, etc.

Two excellent books that set the poets in a wider historical and social context are A. R. Burn, The Lyric Age of Greece (London, 1960), and O. Murray, Early Greece (London, 1980).

For all aspects of musical performance—singing, instruments, rhythms, scales, melody—I may refer to my Ancient Greek Music (Oxford, 1992).

ARCHILOCHUS

Epodes*

1. To Lycambes

172 Papa Lycambes, what d'you mean by this?
Who has unhinged your wits that used to be so sound? Now you turn out the big laugh of the town.

173 You've turned your back on the great bond of shared salt and table . . .

174 There is a tale men tell of how a vixen with an eagle once made friends . . .

(But one day the eagle flew down and carried off one of the vixen's cubs,)

175 taking it to his sons, and the two fledgelings fell upon a feast unlovely, on the high crag where they had their nest.

176 'You see where that high crag is, rugged, harsh?
That's where he sits, and holds your challenge in contempt.'

177 (The vixen prays:)

'O father Zeus, thine is the power in heaven, and thou dost oversee men's deeds, wicked and lawful; all creatures' rights
and wrongs are thy concern.'

(The prayer did not go unanswered. Some time later the eagle seized a piece of meat from a sacrificial altar,)

179           brought it and set it down before his sons, a feast doom-laden . . .

180           There was a spark of fire in it . . .

(And the nest went up in flames, fledglings and all.)

181           . . . aware of the disaster . . . helpless . . .
                  . . . took his way swiftly through the air
                  wheeling on speedy wings.
                  . . . Now, do you expect . . . ?

2. To a Member of the College of Herald's

185           I want to tell you folk a tale, your Honour,
                  —oh, it's a mournful dispatch!
                  A monkey left the other animals and wandered alone in the wild,
                  and there a crafty fox came up to him,
                  bearing a heart full of guile.

(The fox said it had found a treasure which the monkey ought to have, in view of his distinguished status, and led him to a trap that a man had baited with meat.)

225           'Pray go ahead: you are of noble birth!'

186           pressing the bar of the trap.

(The monkey was caught in an undignified posture, releasing the meat for the fox. He remonstrated with the fox, who answered:)

187           'But oh sir Monkey—with a bum like that, thinking so much of yourself?'

3. To an Ex-mistress

188           Your tender skin has lost its former bloom, dries out in furrows; ugly age makes you its prey. Sweet charm from your fair face

                  has hopped it. After all, the winds of many winters have assaulted you, and many a time . . .

her girlhood's flower has shed its petals, lost all the enchantment it had.
 She never got enough;
 she's proved her . . . 's measure, crazy woman.
 Keep her away—for the crows!
 I pray no friend of mine would have me marry somebody like her and give all the neighbours a laugh.
 No, you're the one I want.
 You're not untrustworthy, you're not two-faced,
 but she's so precipitate, she makes friends with crowds of men.
 I don't want babies blind and premature,
 like the proverbial bitch,
 from showing too much haste.'
 That's what I said; and then I took the girl, and laying her down in the flowers,
 with my soft-textured cloak
 I covered her; my arm cradled her neck, while she in her fear like a fawn gave up the attempt to run.
 Gently I touched her breasts, where the young flesh
 peeped from the edge of her dress,
 her ripeness newly come,
 and then, caressing all her lovely form,
 I shot my hot energy off,
 just brushing golden hairs.

Fragments of other epodes

- 168      Fitzdarling, delight of the people, I've got a funny story
             to tell you, my dearest companion,
             and I guarantee you'll like it.
 184      She was a cheater—water in one hand, fire in the other.
 197      Father Zeus, I had no wedding feast . . .

- 200 He won't get off scot-free from me.
 201 The fox knows lots of tricks,
 the hedgehog only one—but it's a winner.
 192 (On a Shipwreck)
 From fifty men Poseidon Hippios chose Koiranos to spare.
 298 Among the gods Zeus is the trustiest seer, controlling the outcome himself.

Erotic fragments

- 23 I replied:
 'Madam, you mustn't be at all afraid of ill repute. As for . . .
 I'll deal with it. Don't you be angry with me.
 You really think I'm such a wretch as that?
 You must have seen me as a low-class churl,
 not what I am and what my forebears were.
 I know the art of loving him that loves me, hating my hater and foulmouthing him with an ant's venom. So I'm quite sincere.
 This citadel that you are walking in was never sacked by any man, but now your spear has conquered it, yours is the glory:
 so be its queen, enjoy dominion.
 I dare say quite a few will envy you.'
- 48 Their nurse brought them along, with scented hair and bosoms, such that even an old man would have desired them. Oh Glaucus, . . .
- 30, 31 She had a myrtle-sprig and a beautiful rose that she was playing with; her hair hung down shading her shoulders and her upper back.
 32 . . . right through the myrtle-spray.
 36 They lay down in the shadow of the wall
 37 There is this wall that runs all round the yard.
 39 Every man rolled back his skin . . .

247 . . . his tender horn . . .

40 . . . wet mound of Venus . . .

41 Up and down she bounced like a kingfisher flapping on a jutting rock.

42 Like a Thracian or Phrygian drinking beer through a tube
she sucked, stooped down, engaged too from behind.

43 And his dong
. . . flooded over like a Prienian stall-fed donkey's . . .

44 . . . foam all round her mouth . . .

45 They stooped and spurted off all their accumulated wantonness.

46 . . . through the tube into the vessel.

47 The virgin priestesses with cudgels drove you away from the door.

60 O fortunate man, to have such daughters to his name!

66 . . . a growth between the thighs . . .

67 I won't use surgery,
I know another sovereign remedy for a growth of this description.

222 . . . and severed the tendons of his middle parts.

252 But the sinews of his wick are ruptured . . .

118-20

I wish I had as sure a chance of fingering Neoboule—
the workman falling to his flask—and pressing tum to tummy
and thighs to thighs . . .
as sure as I know how to start the lovely round of singing
lord Dionysus' dithyramb when the wine has blitzed my brains in.

Political fragments

- 20 My tears are for Thasos' troubles, not Magnesia's.* 21 . . . while Thasos stands here like the spine of a donkey, wreathed with unkempt forest.
 It's not a beautiful or lovely place
 22 or charming like the Siris river lands.*
 Erxias, how's that god-forsaken army 88 regrouping this time?

- Let the stone of Tantalus 91 not be poised above this island . . .

into the fray. Zeus held the balance equal,
 not turning either of the fronts . . .
 earth ran with blood . . .

- 93 . . . the son of Pisistratus brought back these connoisseurs of lyre and pipe to Thasos, with a cargo of pure gold for bribing Thracian dogs. But then for sake of private gain they did a public harm.

- 94 By their battle line stood Athena favouringly, daughter of loud-thundering Zeus.
 She it was that stirred that much-lamented country's army's hearts.
 Fugitives that day were seeking billets in many different parts;
 they retreated many furlongs . . .
 . . . but the Olympian gods' intent . . .

- 96 Glaucus, which of the gods has turned your wits?
 Have a thought for this land . . .
 braving dangers with us . . .
 . . . your spear conquered . . .

- 98 . . . spears . . . broke their spirit . . .
 . . . Athena, daughter of Zeus.
 Round the high battlements their country's doom
 they fought off . . . there was set a looming bastion, impressive, that we built of stone

. . . men of Lesbos . . .

. . . put shields on their arms . . .

. . . Zeus the Olympians' . . .

With our slick spears we were inflicting woe,
but round the wall they busily set ladders, their courage high. Loud boomed the ironclad contrivance . . . alternate; streams of missiles . . .

Quivers no longer hid their store of death

. . . arrows, while they . . .

. . . twisting the sinews, drawing bows . . .

101 For seven of the enemy we overtook and slew,
a thousand of us claim the kill . . .

228 But as for Thasos, that thrice-wretched city . . .

102 All Greece's wretchedness is now drained down to Thasos . . .

105 Glaucus, see,* the waves are rising and the deep sea is disturbed;

all about the heights of Gyrae stands a towering mass of cloud—

that's a sign of storm. I fall a prey to unexpected fear.

106 . . . fast ships at sea

. . . let's untie the sheets and slacken sail.

Father Zeus, hold our wind fair and keep our comrades safe, for then when we land you'll have our thanks; and keep the gusts and gales away, don't hurl this new storm upon us as we fight the churning waves

. . . but take thought on our behalf . . .

107 Many of them, I expect, the burning Dog-star will parch up,
shining fiercely down . . .

108 Hear me, lord Hephaestus, to my supplication be a favouring ally: grant the favours that are yours to grant.

- 110 It's true what they say: the god of war's impartial toward men.
- 111 And encourage the younger men; but victory's under the gods' control.
- 114 I don't like an army commander who's tall, or goes
at a trot,
or one who has glamorous wavy hair, or trims his beard a lot.
A shortish sort of chap, who's bandy-looking round the shins,
he's my ideal, one full of guts, and steady on his pins.
- 115 But now Leophilus is in charge, it's Leophilus' turn to be king;
everything's clear for Leophilus,
pray silence for Leophilus,
and all that sort of thing.

Miscellaneous iambic fragments

- 19 'Gyges* and all his gold don't interest me.
I've never been prey to envy, I don't marvel at heavenly things, or yearn for great dominion.
That's all beyond the sights of such as me.'

Thus quoth Charon the joiner . . .

- 24 Welcome back, . . . In a small ship you crossed a mighty sea, and made it home from Gortyn.*
. . . I'm glad of this as well.
It wasn't the best of vessels that you came in,
. . . but God
held his hand over you, and now you're here
. . . I don't mind about the cargo, if you are safe, whether it's gone for good or whether there's some way to get it back.
I'd never find another friend like you,
if you'd been drowned at sea, or at the hands of spearmen lost your manhood's glorious prime.
But now it stays in bloom, God's kept you safe

. . . and see me left alone
 . . . prostrate in the gloom
 . . . I'm brought back to the light of day.

- 25 There is no single kind of human nature,
 but different things warm different people's hearts.
 For instance, Melesandros favours prick, Phalangios the cowherd is for . . .
 This revelation comes to you from me,
 no other prophet; Zeus the Olympians' father made me a . . . among men and a good one, whom not even Eurymas could fault . . .

- 26 And you too,
 O lord Apollo, strike the guilty ones with harm, destroy them as you do destroy,* but prosper us . . .

- 49 You most hateful . . .
 sneak-thief who roams about the town at night.

116 Let Paros go—those figs, that life at sea.

117 Sing, Muse, of the coiffeur Glaucus . . .

122 (A father speaks)

There's nothing now you can't expect, nothing's against the odds,
 there are no miracles, now Zeus the father of the gods
 has turned the noonday into night and hidden the bright sun
 out of the sky, so clammy dread came over everyone.
 From now on all is credible, and like enough to be:
 let none of you now be surprised at anything you see,
 not even if land animals switch to where dolphins roam,
 and the salt sea and the crashing waves become
 their chosen home,
 while dolphins take a fancy to the mountains and
 the trees.

Indeed, already we observe that Archeanactides, the . . . the son of . . .
has entered wedlock . . .
. . . but my daughter . . .

124 (To Pericles)

. . . like Mykonos people . . .
you drank my wine in quantity and strength and brought no contribution . . .
and you didn't wait to be invited, like a friend; your belly led your wits astray to shamelessness . . .

125 I crave a fight with you, it's like a thirst,

126 But I do have one good skill, that's to repay whoever hurts me with a corresponding ill.

223 It's a cicada you've got by the wing.

127 So I did wrong. I daresay others have been caught the same.

128 Heart, my heart, with helpless, sightless troubles
now confounded,
up, withstand the enemy, opposing breast to breast.

All around they lie in wait, but stand you firmly grounded,
not over-proud in victory, nor in defeat oppressed.
In your rejoicing let your joy, in hardship your despairs
be tempered: understand the pattern shaping men's affairs.

129 For now, my heart, your friends let you go hang.

130 It all depends upon the gods. Often enough, when men
are prostrate on the ground with woe, they set them up again;
and often enough, when men are standing proud and all seems bright,
they tip them over on their backs, and then they're in a plight—

a man goes wandering, short of bread, out of his mind with fright.

131-2 Mortals have moods that vary, Glaucus, son of Leptines,
according to the kind of day that father Zeus decrees;
their attitudes are governed by whatever each one sees.

133 No one here enjoys respect or reputation once he's dead:
in this city we the living tend to cultivate instead the living's favour. Once you die, you get the worst of everything.

134 After all, it isn't good to mock the dead . . .

205 Otherwise
you'd not be using scent, a crone like you.

206 . . . fat round the ankles, a disgusting creature.

213 . . . with their lives in the arms of the waves.

215 (On the loss at sea of the poet's sister's husband)

I feel no interest
in iambi or amusements.

216 Now I'll be called an auxiliary, like a Carian.

217 . . . with hair cut off the shoulders, basin-fashion.

220 In that event . . .
I'd want the earth to open and swallow me.

233 In that situation
your legs are your best possession.

259 Not even Heracles beat two at once.

297 He was skulking at home, the revolting prat.

302 We often see
how wealth that was built up by much hard work all drains away into a harlot's gut.

Adesp. 35

. . . avenging spirits . . .

Be sure of this: the gods take awful toll of impious men who wrong their dearest ones, and no one who's betrayed his mother or his sister's ever done well out of it.

You'll pay the price, I prophesy you will:
however many sheep you slaughter for her wedding-feast, a fate implacable will get you . . . you won't soften your heart or . . . when you've ruined an innocent.
Even when gods are well-disposed, one can't please them in everything . . .

Adesp. 38

. . . His teeth were chattering . . .
As for running when you have to—as on that occasion God,
being angry with those people, drove the enemy army on—
that was no disgrace to you . . . my long-haired lad,
that you shook your sturdy shield off and turned tail . . .
Braver men than you have given way to panics
such as that;
nobody can beat the gods. But as for quitting the campaign
out of all the rest, and coming hotfoot back across the sea,
not a scratch upon you, well now, not much glory
for you there.

Elegies

- 1 I am a servant of the lord god of war,
and one versed in the Muses' lovely gifts.
- 2 On my spear's my daily bread,
on my spear my wine
from Ismaros;* and drinking it,
it's on my spear I recline.
- 3 There won't be many bows drawn, nor much slingshot,
when on the plain the War-god brings the fight together; it will be an agony of swords—that is the warfare that the doughty barons of Euboea are expert at . . .

4 But come now, take the cup and pass along the clipper's benches, open up the casks and draw the red wine off the lees—we too shall need some drink to get us through this watch.

5 Some Saian* sports my splendid shield:
I had to leave it in a wood,
but saved my skin. Well, I don't care—
I'll get another just as good.

6 . . . giving the enemy
a nasty leaving-present . . .

14 Aisimides, if you mind what other folk will say, you'll never have a lovely time.

15 Glaucus, an auxiliary's a buddy for just so long as he's prepared to fight.

16 It's Luck and Destiny, Pericles, that bring whatever a man gets . . .

17 Everything comes to men from work and human effort . . .

9 (On the loss at sea of the poet's sister's husband)

It would have been less hard, if we had had his head, his fair limbs to wrap up in white for the holy fire to operate upon.

11 Well, wine will help . . .
For tears won't heal my wound; if I attend feasts and diversions, they won't make it worse.

Further fragments on shipwrecks

8 And often in the reaches of the white-hair-tossing sea
they prayed for sweet safe homecoming . . .

12 . . . put lord Poseidon's painful offerings away . . .

Not a man in the town will find fault, Pericles, with our mourning, and enjoy his festival,
nor in the canton: such fine men the surge of the tempestuous sea has overwhelmed, and swollen are our lungs with piercing pain.

But then, my friend, the gods for ills past healing

have set endurance as the antidote.

This woe is different men's at different times:
now it has come our way, and we bemoan
our bleeding wound; another day 'twill pass to others. Come then, everyone endure, spend no more time in womanish lament.

SEMONIDES

- 1 Loud-thundering Zeus controls the outcome, lad,
in everything, and makes it how he wants.
Men have no foresight, but from day to day they live like cattle, knowing not at all how God will bring each matter to its end;
yet everybody feeds on hope and trust throughout his vain endeavours. Some await tomorrow, some the turning of the seasons;
there's no man does not think he'll reach next year
the Wealth-god's darling, and society's.
But one is overtaken by old age before he makes his goal, others succumb to grim diseases, others slain in war Hades escorts below dark earth, while some die out at sea, by tempests buffeted and the salt purple deep's unending waves, when they can make no living on the land;
others again fasten themselves a noose
and leave the sunlight by their own grim choice.
So we are spared no ill, but numberless dangers and hurts for which we cannot plan exist for mortals. If I had my way, we would not cling to sorrow, or so long torment ourselves by dwelling on our woes.
- 2 When someone died, we would not think of him—
if we had any sense—more than a day.
- 3 For we have time enough for being dead;
for living, just a few unhappy years.
- 4 No life is wholly free from fault or harm.
- 5 . . . runs like an unweaned colt beside its dam.
- 6 A wife?* There's nothing better a man can get than a good one—and nothing ghastlier than a bad.

7 God made diverse the ways of womankind.
One he created from a hairy sow;
in her house everything's a mess of filth rolling about untidy on the floor, and she herself, unwashed, in dirty clothes,
eats herself fat and wallows in the muck.

One from a wicked vixen he created, expert in every trick. She misses nothing so long as it's bad, or even if it's good:
what's good she mostly denigrates, what's bad
she praises. But her moods are changeable.

One from a bitch: a slut, that by herself gets pregnant; wants to hear and wants to know every damned thing, peers everywhere and prowls and yelps although there's no one to be seen.
The man can't make her stop, neither with threats nor if he knocks her teeth out with a stone in rage, nor if he speaks with gentle words, not even if she's sitting among guests,
but all the time he has this hopeless blight.

Another the Olympians shaped from earth and gave a man: a lame duck, ignorant of good and ill alike. The only skill she knows is eating—oh, and when God sends a frost, to pull her chair up to the fire.

Another from the sea: she has two moods.
One day she sparkles and her face is bright;
a guest who sees her will pay compliments,
'No finer, fairer wife in all the world!'
Another day she's insupportable to look at or go near to, raging mad like a bitch over her puppies, savagely at odds with friends and enemies alike—
just as the sea sometimes stands motionless and harmless, a delight to those who sail, in summertime, but sometimes rages wild with thunderous swell rampaging to and fro.
That's what this kind of woman's like—in mood,
I mean; there's no resemblance in her looks!

Another from an obstinate grey ass,

that after thwacks and curses just consents and does the minimum. And then she eats in the shadows, eats at the hearth, all night, all day;
and likewise hungry for the act of love
she welcomes anyone that comes along.

One from a weasel—miserable breed,
with no fair feature or desirable or lovely or delightful to her name.
She's quite resourceless in the bed of love, making the passenger seasick. She's a pest to neighbours with her thieving; often, too, she eats the food that was for sacrifice.

A fancy mare was mother to another, who baulks at chores or anything that's hard
and wouldn't touch a millstone, lift a sieve, or clear the shit out, or sit at the stove
for fear of soot; and yet compels a man to love her. Twice a day she takes a bath, or three times, some days; then she puts on scent.
Her long, lush hair is always combed, and decked with flowers: hah, this sort of woman makes a lovely sight for others, but a plague for the man she belongs to, that's to say unless he's some big tyrant or some sceptred king whose heart takes pride in suchlike fripperies.

One from a monkey: quite the deadest loss that Zeus has given us, this one. Ugly face—the whole town sniggers when this sort goes past;
short in the neck; in all her movements stiff, fixed legs, no bum. Poor sod, who cuddles that!
And like a monkey, she knows all the tricks
and tropes, oh yes, but doesn't like a joke.
She'd do no good to anyone, but looks and thinks all day how she can do most harm.

One from a bee: he's lucky who gets her,
for she's the only one on whom no blame alights. Wealth grows and prospers at her hands.
Bound in affection with her husband she grows old, her children handsome and esteemed.
Among all women she stands out; a charm divine surrounds her. She does not enjoy sitting with women when they talk of sex.

Of all the wives that Zeus bestows on men,
this kind's the finest and most sensible.

But all those other breeds, by Zeus' design, exist and ever will abide with men.

Yes, the worst pestilence Zeus ever made is women. Even if they look to be a helpmeet, yet the master suffers most:
the man who keeps a woman in his house never gets through a whole day in good cheer, nor will he soon drive Hunger from his door,
that hostile lodger, hateful deity.

When with his household he seems most content,
whether by God's grace or on man's account,
she finds some fault, and girds herself for war.
Where there's a woman, they may not be keen even to welcome in a visitor.

I'll tell you, she that looks the best-behaved
in fact is the most rotten of them all,
for while her man gawps fondly at her, oh,
the neighbours' merriment: another dupe!

Yes, when the talk's of wives, each man will praise
his own and criticize the other bloke's, but we don't realize it's equal shares.

For Zeus made wives as his worst pestilence and fettered us in bonds unbreakable.

It's long been so: remember those who fought round Troy's old city for a woman's sake and found a home in Hades, [and again those others who were murdered at their hearth . . .]

8 . . . like an eel down in the slime.

9 A heron, coming on a buzzard eating a fine Maeander eel, took it away.

10 Why do I make a lengthy tale of this?

10a Do not be proud of never washing, nor a water-maniac; grow no bushy beard, nor wrap your body in a filthy cloak.

CALLINUS

1     How long will you lie idle? When will you young men
      take courage? Don't our neighbours make you feel ashamed, so much at ease? You look to sit at peace,
      but all the country's in the grip of war!

and throw your last spear even as you die.
For proud it is and precious for a man to fight defending country, children, wedded wife against the foe. Death comes no sooner than the Fates
have spun the thread; so charge, turn not aside, with levelled spear and brave heart in behind the shield
from the first moment that the armies meet.
A man has no escape from his appointed death,
not though his blood be of immortal stock.
Men sometimes flee the carnage and the clattering of spears, and meet their destiny at home, but such as these the people do not love or miss:
the hero's fate is mourned by high and low.
Everyone feels the loss of the stout-hearted man who dies; alive, he ranks with demigods, for in the people's eyes he is a tower of strength, his single efforts worth a company's.

2, 2a (A prayer to Zeus)

Have mercy on us Smyrnaeans . . .
Think of the times Smyrnaeans have for thee burned fine ox-thighbones.

5a, 4 And now the fierce Cimmerian horde* is on the march,
with Trerians in its wake.

EUMELUS

696* For the god of Ithome approves of the Muse who comes unsullied and wearing the sandals of freedom.

TYRTAEUS

- 2 . . . let us obey [the kings, who are]
nearer the line [of the gods].
For fair-crowned Hera's husband, Kronos' son himself,
Zeus, gave the sons of Heracles this state.
Under their lead we left windswept Erineos and came to Pelops' broad sea-circled land.*
- 4 This was the oracle from Phoebus that they heard at Delphi, and brought back the god's decree:
'First in debate shall heaven's favourites, the kings,
the guardians of fair Sparta's polity, speak, and the elders. After them the commoners shall to direct proposals make response with conscientious speech and all just consequence,
making no twisted plans against our realm;
and commoners' majority shall win the day.'
Phoebus brought forth this guidance for the state.
- 5 . . . our sovereign Theopompus, whom the gods
did love,
through whom we took Messene's broad dance-grounds,
Messene good to plough and good to plant for fruit.
To conquer her they fought full nineteen years steadfastly ever, with endurance in their hearts, those spearmen of our fathers' fathers' time,
and in the twentieth the foe took flight, and left their fertile farms among Ithome's heights.
- 6 (The enslaved Messenians were) like donkeys suffering under heavy loads, by painful force compelled to bring their masters half
of all the produce that the soil brought forth.

- 7 . . . making a wailing funeral chorus, they and their wives,
when one of their masters met his destiny.
- 10 For it is fine to die in the front line,
a brave man fighting for his fatherland,
and the most painful fate's to leave one's town
and fertile farmlands for a beggar's life, roaming with mother dear and aged father,
with little children and with wedded wife.
He'll not be welcome anywhere he goes,
bowing to need and horrid poverty,
his line disgraced, his handsome face belied;
every humiliation dogs his steps.
This is the truth: the vagrant is ignored and slighted, and his children after him.
So let us fight with spirit for our land,
die for our sons, and spare our lives no more.
You young men, keep together, hold the line,
do not start panic or disgraceful rout.
Keep grand and valiant spirits in your hearts,
be not in love with life—the fight's with men!
Do not desert your elders, men with legs
no longer nimble, by recourse to flight:
it is disgraceful when an older man falls in the front line while the young hold back, with head already white, and grizzled beard, gasping his valiant breath out in the dust
and clutching at his bloodied genitals, his nakedness exposed: a shameful sight and scandalous. But for the young man, still in glorious prime, it is all beautiful:
alive, he draws men's eyes and women's hearts;
felled in the front line, he is lovely yet.
Let every man then, feet set firm apart,
bite on his lip and stand against the foe.
- 11 But Heracles unvanquished sowed your stock:
take heart! Zeus bows not yet beneath the yoke.
Fear not the throng of men, turn not to flight, but straight toward the front line bear your shields,

despising life and welcoming the dark contingencies of death like shafts of sun.
 You know what wreck the woeful War-god makes,
 and are well to the grim fight's temper tuned.
 You have been with pursuers and pursued,
 you young men, and had bellyful of both.
 You know that those who bravely hold the line and press toward engagement at the front die in less numbers, with the ranks behind protected; those who run, lose all esteem.
 The list is endless of the ills that hurt
 the man who learns to think the coward's thoughts:

for it's a bad place, as he flees the fray,
 to have his wound, between the shoulder-blades,
 and it's a shameful sight to see him lie dead in the dust, the spear-point in his back.
 Let every man, then, feet set firm apart,
 bite on his lip and stand against the foe,
 his thighs and shins, his shoulders and his chest
 all hidden by the broad bulge of his shield.
 Let his right hand brandish the savage lance,
 the plume nod fearsomely above his head.
 By fierce deeds let him teach himself to fight,
 and not stand out of fire—he has a shield—
 but get in close, engage, and stab with lance or sword, and strike his adversary down.
 Plant foot by foeman's foot, press shield on shield, thrust helm at helm, and tangle plume with plume,
 opposing breast to breast: that's how to fight,
 with the long lance or sword-grip in your hand.
 You light-armed men, wherever you can aim from the shield-cover, pelt them with great rocks and hurl at them your smooth-shaved javelins, helping the armoured troops with close support.

- 12 I would not rate a man worth mention or account either for speed of foot or wrestling skill, not even if he had a Cyclops' size and strength or could outrun the fierce north wind of Thrace;

I would not care if he surpassed Tithonus' looks,
or Cinyras' or Midas' famous wealth,
or were more royal than Pelops son of Tantalus, or had Adrastus' smooth persuasive tongue,
or fame for everything save only valour: no,
no man's of high regard in time of war
unless he can endure the sight of blood and death, and stand close to the enemy, and fight.
This is the highest worth, the finest human prize and fairest for a bold young man to win.
It benefits the whole community and state,
when with a firm stance in the foremost rank
a man bides steadfast, with no thought of shameful flight,
laying his life and stout heart on the line,
and standing by the next man speaks encouragement.
This is the man of worth in time of war.
Soon he turns back the foemen's sharp-edged battle lines
and strenuously stems the tide of arms;
his own dear life he loses, in the front line felled,
his breast, his bossed shield pierced by many a wound,
and of his corselet all the front, but he has brought glory upon his father, army, town.
His death is mourned alike by young and old; the whole
community feels the keen loss its own.
People point out his tomb, his children in the street,
his children's children and posterity.
His name and glorious reputation never die;
he is immortal even in his grave,
that man the furious War-god kills as he defends his soil and children with heroic stand.
Or if in winning his proud spear-vaunt he escapes
the doom of death and grief's long shadow-cast, then all men do him honour, young and old alike;
much joy is his before he goes below.

He grows old in celebrity, and no one thinks
 to cheat him of his due respect and rights, but all men at the public seats make room for him,
 the young, the old, and those of his own age.
 This is the excellence whose heights one now must seek to scale, by not relenting in the fight.

13 . . . a tawny lion's spirit in your breast.

14 . . . until it ends
 in highest heroism, or in death.

19 . . . throwers of stones, and archers,
 . . . like hordes of wasps . . .
 . . . the man-destroying War-god . . .

. . . protected by your convex shields, Pamphyloi, Hylleis, and Dymanes,* each distinct,
 your murderous lances levelled in your hands.
 . . . (not?) leave it all to the immortal gods

but with concerted charge at once we'll crush their front,
 meeting the enemy spearmen face to face.
 A fearsome clangour will be heard, as the two sides dash shields against round shields . . .
 . . . falling upon each other,
 and corselets on men's breasts will fend away destruction, yet be dented by the points of spears.
 The brazen helmets will resound beneath the battering of rocks . . .

23a But as they fight, Athena, pale-eyed daughter of Zeus who holds the Aegis,* checks the wild spears' flight.

A multitude will throw with javelins sharp-pointed . . .

in light arms running forward . . .
 Arcadians . . . the Argives' . . . along the wall . . .
 . . . from pale-eyed Athena . . . ditch . . .

They will kill every Spartan that they catch fleeing the battle . . .

MIMNERMUS

- 1 What's life, what's joy, without love's heavenly gold?
I hope I die when I no longer care
for secret closeness, tender favours, bed, which are the rapturous flowers that grace youth's prime for men and women. But when painful age comes on, that makes a man loathsome and vile, malignant troubles ever vex his heart;
seeing the sunlight gives him joy no more.
He is abhorred by boys, by women scorned:
so hard a thing God made old age to be.
- 2 But we are like the leaves that flowery spring puts forth, quick spreading in the sun's warm light:
for a brief span of time we take our joy
in our youth's bloom, the future, good or ill, kept from us, while the twin dark Dooms stand by,
one bringing to fulfilment harsh old age,
the other, death. The ripeness of youth's fruit is short, short as the sunlight on the earth, and once this season of perfection's past,
it's better to be dead than stay alive.
All kinds of worry come. One man's estate is failing, and there's painful poverty;
another has no sons—the keenest need one feels as one goes down below the earth; sickness wears down another's heart. There's none Zeus does not give a multitude of ills.
- 3 Most handsome once, perhaps, but when his season's past,
he's loathed and slighted even by his sons.
- 4 He gave Tithonus* an unending bane,
old age, that is more frightful than harsh death.
- 5 The sweat runs down me, and my heart's a-flutter, seeing my generation in its bloom of joy and beauty. Oh, it ought to last for longer! But it's fleeting as a dream, our precious youth; in no time ugly, harsh,

 hateful old age is looming over us, unvalued, that enveloping deforms past recognition, dims both sight and mind.

- 6 I pray my fated death may catch me hale and hearty at threescore years.
 7 Enjoy yourself. As for the wretched townsfolk, some will speak ill of you—but only some.
 8 Let us be honest, you and me.
 It is the rightest thing to be.
 9 Aipy we left,* and Neleus' city, Pylos, and came by ship to Asia's lovely coast.
 We settled at fair Colophon with rude aggression, bringers of harsh insolence;
 from there we crossed the river Asteïs (?) and took Aeolian Smyrna by God's will.

11, 11a

Jason would not have brought that great fleece* home from Aea at the end of that ordeal
 he suffered for the arrogant Pelias;
 they'd not have reached the river of World's End.

Aetes' city, where the swift sun's rays are stored in a gold chamber by the edge of the world stream, where godlike Jason went.

- 12 The sun must toil along day after day:
 there's never any break or rest for him or for his horses, once rosefinger Dawn leaves the world stream and climbs into the sky.
 A wondrous couch bears him across the waves—winged, by Hephaestus intricately wrought in precious gold—as he in grateful sleep skims o'er the sea from the Hesperides to Aethiopia,* where a chariot and steeds await the early birth of Dawn;
 and there the god mounts his new equipage, Hyperion's son.

- 13<sup>a</sup> So when the king had given his command, they charged, protected by their convex shields.
- 14 His strength and bravery were not like yours,
as I have heard from older men who saw him on the plain of Hermos* with his spear routing the Lydian cavalry's thick ranks.
Pallas Athena ne'er had cause to fault his acid fury, when in the front line he hurtled through the battle's bloody moil against the stinging missiles of the foe.
No warrior of the enemy remained his better in the strenuous work of war, so long as he moved in the swift sun's light.

ALCMAN

1 . . . Among the dead, Lykaithos concerns me not,* nor Enarsphoros and fleet-foot Seberos and the mighty . . . and the warrior . . . , Euteiches, lord Areitos, and . . .
outstanding among the heroes of old . . .
great Eurytos . . . the nobles;
all these we shall pass by:
Measure and Means* are senior of the gods,
and help from Zeus comes prompt, nor waits to do up shoes. Let no man seek to fly to heaven, possess in love fair Aphrodite, or the queen of gods,
or some delicious nymph;
but the sweet-eyed Graces of music may go in to the hall of Zeus.

One was slain with an arrow, one laid low with a bright millstone . . . Hades . . .
So they paid dearly for their wickedness.

There's such a thing as God's requital. Fortunate is he who in good heart plaits up his day sans tears.
Now my song's of the radiance of Agido: she to my eyes shines like the sun she calls to be our witness.
But I must not speak good or ill of her when the dancers' famous principal herself stands out like a racehorse set among the sheep, a thundering winner, the sort you see in dreams
as you doze in a cavern's shade.

Ah, look—the mount's a Venetian;* that combed-out hair
of cousin Hagesichora has a sheen like purest gold,
and that silver face—why say it in words?
There's Hagesichora;
while Agido's nearest challenger for looks will be a Scythian nag to an Iberian.
The Pleiades that go up before daybreak fight it out with us as we bear the plough,* our Sirius, through the ambrosial night.

Our purple finery is not
the treasure that defends us,
no coiled snake-bangle of solid gold, nor Lydian headband splendid upon girls with big dark eyes,
nor Nanno's hair, no, nor nymphlike Areta, nor Thulakis, nor Klesithera; nor will you go to Ainesimbrotas* and say
'Oh please make Astaphis mine' or 'Make Philylla look my way', Damareta, or sweet Vianthemis.
No, it's Hagesichora—
she is my heartache.

For her beauty of ankles is not here in the dance:
she bides by Agido, commends our ceremonial. Gods, receive their prayers—in the gods' hands lies fulfilment.
Dance-leader, I may say that in myself
I'm just a maid that vainly hoots like the owl in the roof: Aotis* is the one I chiefly hope to please,
who gives us relief from toil; but Hagesichora brings girls into sweet concord.

For the team must turn with the trace-horse,
and the helmsman rules the ship.
The Sirens' tone indeed is music more than ours;

they are divine, and not eleven girls but ten sing in this choir. Yet it gives voice like the swan on the waters of Xanthos, and she with her darling flaxen hair, Hagesichora . . .

2 There, in highest respect from gods and men, they dwell . . . in a chamber divinely built, masters of swift colts—Castor—skilled horsemen—and glorious Polydeuces.

3 Muses of Olympus, my heart is rapt with desire of hearing a new song and the unison of girls in lovely melody
. . . will dispel
the sweetness of sleepy eyelids.
. . . draws me along to the piazza,
there where I'll be tossing my flaxen hair
. . . a dance for tender feet . . .

and with crippling longing. Her glance more melting than sleep or death;
hers is a potent sweetness.

But Astymeloisa gives me no response, just flits with her garland
like a falling star through the splendour of the night, a golden shoot, a tuft of down—
gone in a few strides of her long legs.

All Cinyras' glistening charm sits on our damsel hair,

But as to milady Astymeloisa,* out in the crowd, she wins the public's heart.

If she would just come up, take my young hand,
I'd soon be begging her favour.

But as things are, in angry mood . . .
. . . the girl . . .

14(a) Hey Muse, euphonious Muse, full of melodies, ever the singer,
make start of a new song for the girls to sing!

- 16 He was no yokel,
no fool even among experts;
not of Thessalian stock,
no shepherd from Nether Wallop,
but from the centre of Sardis.
- 17 And sometime I'll lend you a full-bellied cauldron
in which you can put all your oddments together.
It's never yet been on the fire, but soon it'll stand full of soup, the sort Alcman the trencherman dotes on, all hot in the depths of midwinter.
For really, he doesn't eat anything fancy,
but looks for the ordinary, just like the people.
- 19 Seven couches, and to each a table bedecked with poppy-seed rolls, linseed and sesame, and bowls
of . . . stuck with golden honey.
- 20 Of seasons he created three,
summer, winter, and autumn to boot;
and for a fourth, the spring, when things are growing, but a man can't eat his fill.
- 26 My legs can support me no longer, young ladies with voices of honey and song divine!
Ah, would that I could be a kingfisher, flying sea-blue, fearless, amid you halcyons down to rest on the foaming brine!
- 27 Hey Muse, daughter of Zeus, Calliope, make me a start of delightful poetry:
give my song charm, and beautiful dancing.
- 38 And all the young girls among us speak highly of the man that plays the lyre.
- 39, 40 These verses and melody Alcman found by harking to the voice of chattering partridges . . .
I know the tunes of all the birds.
- 45 May our chorus be pleasing to all Zeus' house
and to thee, lord Apollo.
- 56 Often enough, in the heights of the mountains
when festival torches please the gods, you've taken a golden bowl, a big one like shepherds have; filled it with milk of a lioness, then made a big firm cheese for Hermes slayer of Argus.*

- 58 It's not the goddess of love,
 just wild Cupid playing his boyish games, alighting on the petals—please don't touch!—
 of my galingale garland.
- 59a Cupid once more by the goddess's grace trickles down in his sweetness, warming my heart.
- 59b Such is the offering of pleasant Muses made manifest by Megalostrata
 the flaxen-haired, a girl for girls to envy.
- 60 'And I pray to you, bringing this garland of helichryse and lovely galingale.'
- 81 And the girls all say,
 'Father Zeus, I wish he could be my husband!'
- 89 They sleep, the mountain peaks,
 the clefts, ridges, and gullies,
 and all the creatures that the dark earth feeds,
 the animals of the glen, the tribe of bees,
 the monsters of the salt purple deeps.
 They sleep, the tribes
 of winging birds . . .
- 96 Soon he'll be serving bean-pottage,
 white groats, and the fruit of the honeycomb.
- 98 At feasts and at men's mess unions with banqueters gathered it's fitting to start on the paean.

P. Oxy. 2443 fr. 1 + 3213

. . . as I went up from Trygeai to the White Goddesses' beautiful precinct with two sweet pomegranates.
 The girls, having prayed to the fair-flowing river for lovely fulfilment of marriage and the supreme experience that men and women know, the bridal bed,

SAPPHO

- 1        Rich-throned immortal Aphrodite, scheming daughter of Zeus, I pray you,
with pain and sickness, Queen, crush not my heart,

          but come, if ever in the past you heard my voice from afar and hearkened, and left your father's halls and came, with gold chariot yoked; and pretty sparrows brought you swiftly across the dark earth fluttering wings from heaven through the air.

          Soon they were here, and you, Blest Goddess, smiling with your immortal features,
asked why I'd called, what was the matter now,
          what was my heart insanely craving:
          'Who is it this time I must cozen to love you, Sappho? Who's unfair to you?
          'For though she flee, soon she'll be chasing;
          though she refuse gifts, she'll be giving;
though she love not, she'll love despite herself.'

          Yes, come once more, from sore obsession free me; all that my heart desires fulfilled, fulfil—help me to victory!
- 2        Come, goddess, to your holy shrine,
          where your delightful apple grove awaits, and altars smoke with frankincense.

          A cool brook sounds through apple boughs,
          and all's with roses overhung;
from shimmering leaves a trancelike sleep takes hold.

          Here is a flowery meadow, too, where horses graze, and gentle blow
the breezes . . .

Here, then, Love-goddess much in mind, infuse our feast in gracious style with nectar poured in cups that turn to gold.

5 Love-goddess and Sea-nymphs, please let my brother reach here safe and sound,
 and all his heart's desires be fulfilled,

but let him undo all his past mistakes, gladden his friends and vex his enemies, and . . .

May he be ready to respect
 his sister, and from hurtful pains

15 . . . Love-goddess; may he find you harsh, and Doricha* not boast again
 of how his longing's brought him back to her.

16 Some think a fleet, a troop of horse or soldiery the finest sight in all the world; but I say, what one loves.

Easy it is to make this plain to anyone. She the most fair of mortals, Helen, having a man of the best, deserted him, and sailed to Troy,
 without a thought for her dear child or parents, led astray by [love's power.]

[For though the heart be pr]oud [and strong,] [Love] quickly [bends it to his will. —]
 That makes me think of Anactoria.

I'd sooner see her lovely walk and the bright sparkling of her face than all the horse and arms of Lydia.

17 O lady Hera, may my prayer bring thy enchanting presence close, that Atreus' royal sons* established here
 when they had gone through many trials, round Ilios first, and then at sea:
 when they came here they could not journey on before invoking thee, and Zeus of Suppliants, and Thyone's son*

the lovely. Now grant me thy ancient grace.

Holy and fair . . . virg . . .

. . . take the soft harp, Abanthis, sing of Gongyla;
that yearning aura's on you once again,
my dear. It thrilled you, didn't it, seeing that dress of hers? I'm glad.
The Love-goddess herself has chided me for praying [for new sweethearts and forgetting old ones] . . .

. . . love . . .
For when I see you face to face,
I think, was even Hermione* so fair? Helen herself, perhaps, if so a mortal may be praised. Know this:
your kindness would be my release from all my brooding . . .

Why, we too did all that when we were young.
Yes, lovely times we . . .

. . . and girls
in nightlong celebration sing
of you and of your flower-bosomed bride,
So wake, and go to join your friends, the lads. I reckon we shall see less sleep than the melodious nightingale.

31

He looks to me to be in heaven,
that man who sits across from you and listens near you to your soft speaking, your laughing lovely: that, I vow,
makes the heart leap in my breast;
for watching you a moment, speech fails me,
my tongue is paralysed, at once
a light fire runs beneath my skin,
my eyes are blinded, and my ears drumming,

the sweat pours down me, and I shake
all over, sallower than grass:
I feel as if I'm not far off dying.

But no thing is too hard to bear;
for [God can make] the poor man [rich,
or bring to nothing heaven-high fortune.]

32 (The Muses)

who gave me of their craft, and so set me in high regard.

33 O Aphrodite, crowned in gold,
if only I could have such luck!

34 The stars about the lovely moon withdraw and hide their shining forms, when at her full she bathes the earth in light
. . . silver . . .

36 . . . and I yearn, and I desire . . .

39 A decorated slipper hid her foot, a lovely piece of Lydian work.

41 I cannot change my mind for you, my dears.

44 So the herald Idaeus arrived with the message swift.

' . . . glory that never fades.

Hector comes with his company, bringing from holy Thebes*

and from Plakos' perennial fountain a lovely bride, rich Andromache, voyaging over the briny sea.
Countless bangles of gold they are bringing, and crimson-dyed

robes that float with the breezes, and ornaments finely made,

drinking-vessels of silver past number, and ivory.'

Hector's father sprang eagerly up when he heard the news,

word soon came to the friends of the family
through the town:

Ilus' noble descendants* got busy and harnessed mules

to their finely built carriages; all of the wives got
 in,
 all the girls with their delicate ankles, and on their own Priam's daughters . . .
 while the bachelors harnessed their horses to chariots

. . . to Ilios.

Lyres, melodious shawms, and the clatter of castanets
 blended there, and the voices of girls in the holy song;
 up to heaven the glorious clamour arose . . .
 Everywhere in the streets there were bowls full of wine, and cups,
 myrrh and cassia, frankincense, fragrances all pell-mell.
 All the women of matronly age shouted Eleleu!
 while the men singing out in the beautiful Steepscale Hymn called on Paeon, the god of the excellent bow and lyre,
 praising Hector the prince and Andromache his princess.

- 44A Phoebeus golden of hair, whom the daughter of Koios* bore
 after union with Zeus son of Kronos, whose name is great.
 In Zeus' presence then Artemis swore with the gods' great oath:
 'By thy head, I will keep myself virgin for evermore, roaming free in the heights of the mountains, the lonely peaks.
 Nod now, grant me this favour!' she said, and the blessed gods'
 father nodded, confirming it. Therefore do gods and men
 call her virgin and deersooter, goddess of all the wild;
 noble titles; and Eros can never go near to her . . .

- 46 . . . while I
on soft cushions will spread . . .
- 47 Love
shakes my heart like the wind rushing down on the mountain oaks.
- 48 You came, and I needed you,
and you cooled the fever of longing that racked my
heart.
- 49 Love? Why, I was in love with you, Atthis, a long time back.
Just a plain little girl to my eyes, but . . .
- 50 For the beautiful person is beautiful just in form, but the noble of soul will soon seem to have beauty too.
- 51 I'm uncertain now what I should do; I am in two minds.
- 52 I don't reckon to reach to the sky.
- 53 Holy spirits of Joy, rosy of arm, daughters of Zeus, come nigh.
- 54 Eros, coming from heaven wrapped in a crimson cloak.
- 55 (To a wealthy but unmusical lady)
Yes, and when you are dead, there you will lie for aye
unremembered, because none of Pieria's roses* touch you, but unnoticed in Hades too you will hover among faded forgotten ghosts.
- 56 As to musical skill, never, I think, again shall we see such a girl born to the light of day.
- 57 (To Andromeda)
Who's this country colleen casting a spell on you, one who hasn't yet learned how to arrange her shift
well down over her calves?
- 58 . . . young girls . . .
. . . deep-bosomed Muses' lovely gifts
. . . clear melodious lyre.

But as for me, old age has got my whole body, my hair is white that once was dark.

. . . my knees will not hold up
. . . to dance like the young fawns
. . . but what can I do?

To stay untouched by age, that cannot be:
a lesson, so they say, the goddess Dawn learned, when in her rose arms she bore Tithonus off to the world's east limit; still old age caught up with him . . . his immortal bride.

My liking's for the gracious. Thus does love define my sunlight and my beautiful.

81 So set beautiful wreaths, Dika, about your tresses, plait together the dill shoots with your tender fingers.

Primed with flowers, the blest spirits of Joy most favour

such occasions: they shun people who wear no garlands.

82 Mnasidika is shapelier than tender Gyrinno.

94 . . . . .

Honestly, I wish I were dead.
She was covered in tears as she went away, .

left me, saying 'Oh, it's too bad!
How unlucky we are! I swear, Sappho, I don't want to be leaving you.'

This is what I replied to her:
'Go, be happy, and think of me.
You remember how we looked after you;
or if not, then let me remind

. . . . .

all the lovely and beautiful times we had,
all the garlands of violets and of roses and . . .
and . . . that you've put on in my company,

all the delicate chains of flowers that encircled your tender neck

. . . . .
. . . . .

and the costly unguent with which you anointed yourself, and the royal myrrh.

On soft couches . . .

tender . . .

you assuaged your longing . . .

There was never a . . .

or a shrine or a . . .

. . . that we were not present at,

no grove . . . no festive dance . . .

95 I said 'Master, . . .

For by the blest lady . . .

I take no joy in walking under heaven,

but feel a strange desire to die and see the dewy lotus-banks of Acheron . . .'

96 . . . she worshipped you and always in your singing she most delighted.

But now among the women of Lydia

she shines, as after the sun has set the rosy-fingered moon will appear, surpassing

all the stars, bestowing her light alike

upon the waves of the briny sea and on the fields that sparkle with countless flowers.

Everything is bathed in the lovely dew:

roses take their nourishment, and soft chervil, and the blossoming honey-lotus.

Often, as she moves on her daily round, she'll be eating her tender heart

when she thinks of her love for gentle Atthis.

And for us to go there . . .

. . . it's not possible . . .

with the wedding-song(?) ringing loud between us.

For us to match the beauty of goddesses is not easy . . .

98 (To Sappho's daughter Cleïs)

Why now, Cleïs your grandmother used to say that when she was young, if they had crimson ribbons to bind their hair, that was quite an exceptional ornament.

But when someone has hair like yours flaming brighter than any torch,
then it's very much nicer to have it so,
neatly garlanded with some fresh blooming flowers. But as for these broïdered headbands, it's only just recently that they've brought them from Sardis here to the towns of Ionia

. . . . .

But I haven't the means to buy such a headband for you, my dear.
Be content with our own Mytilenian . . .

99a

. . . of Polyanax's line
. . . Samian . . .

to strum across
the plectrum-welcoming strings . . .
. . . kindly
. . . and it vibrates harmoniously,

[while her fair v]oice
through the h[igh] notes . . .

99b

O son of Zeus and Leto,*
come to the ceremony . . .
leave Gryneia's woods
and thy famed oracle

. . . . .

. . . . .

. . . . .

Again, it's the wild son of Polyanax's line I want to expose.

101 (To Aphrodite)

kerchieves and crimson-dyed aprons that float with the breeze
. . . sent from Phocaea, precious gifts . . .

102 Darling mother, I can no longer ply my loom:
I'm overcome with longing for a slender lad.

104*ab* Hesperus, loveliest of all the stars . . .
bringing back all that glowing Dawn sent forth:
you bring the sheep,
you bring the goat,
you bring the girl to a home away from her mother.

105*a* (On a girl)

Like the sweet-apple that's gleaming red on the topmost bough,
right at the very end, that the apple-pickers forgot,
or rather didn't forget, but were just unable to reach.

105*b* Like the hyacinth on the hills that the passing shepherds
trample under their feet, and the purple bloom on the ground . . .

106 supreme, like the singer from Lesbos performing abroad.

107 I still do cleave to maidenhood.

108 (To a bride)

O you beauty, you charmer . . .

109 'We'll give her', says the father.

110 The doorman's feet* are size 90:
five cowhides went into his sandals,
and it took ten cobblers to make them!

111 High must be the chamber—Hymenaeum!

Make it high, you builders!

A bridegroom's coming—

Hymenaeum!

like the War-god himself, the tallest of the tall!

- 112 Happy groom, the union you prayed for
is now fulfilled, you have the girl of your prayers.
How handsome you are, with your gentle eyes,
and your lovely face all radiant with desire.
The Love-goddess has shown you special favour.
- 113 No other girl now, dear groom, like her . . .
- 114 'Maidenhood, my maidenhood,
where are you going now?'
'I'll visit you no more, my dear, I'll visit you no more.'
- 115 To what, dear groom, can I best liken you?
To a slender sapling I most liken you.
- 116 Hail to the bride, all hail the honoured groom!
- 117 Good wishes, bride! Good wishes to the groom!
- 118 Come, noble lyre, take voice and tell me . . .
- 120 But I am not the resentful sort.
I have a placid heart.
- 121 No, be our friend, but take a younger woman for your bed.
At my age I can't bring myself to live with you.
- 122 I saw her picking flowers,
a girl exceeding tender . . .
- 123 Gold-sandalled Dawn has just . . .
- 126 Sleeping on her tender companion's bosom.
- 127 Muses, once more come nigh,
leave the gold halls of Zeus.
- 128 Come now, gracious spirits of Joy and Muses with lovely hair.
- 129a And you have no thought of me.
- 129b Or you love some other person more than me.
- 130 Once more I feel the sting of crippling Love,
that bittersweet, unmanageable midge.
- . . . . .

Atthis, you've come to hate the thought of me,
you fly to join Andromeda.

132 I have a pretty child, like flowers of gold her form, my precious Cleïs;
whom I would not exchange for all of Lydia, or the lovely land . . .

133 Andromeda is well repaid.

Sappho, why do you . . . Aphrodite who holds all fortune in her hands?

134 I dreamed I spoke with the Cyprian goddess.*
135 Why must the swallow wake me so soon, Eirana?
136 The nightingale that brings the news of spring with lovely voice.

137 (He) 'There's something I want to say to you, but I'm too shy . . . '

(She) 'But if you wanted something good,
your tongue not brewing wicked words,
you'd not be shy, you'd speak as you saw fit.'

138 Stand facing me, dear man, and let the beauty of your eyes shine out.

140 'Aphrodite, tender Adonis is dying!* What can we do?'

'You must beat your breasts, o maidens, you must tear your tunics too.'

141 There stood a bowl
of ambrosia mixed,
and Hermes took a jug and served the gods.

Then they all poured libations from their goblets, praying blessings on the groom.

142 Leto and Niobe* were the best of friends.

166 They say that Leda once did find an egg*
well covered in a clump of hyacinth.

143 And chick-peas grew there golden on the banks.

146 I'll do without the honey, and the stings.

- 147 I'm sure that people will remember us.
148 Wealth without class is no safe house-guest.
150 (To her daughter)
In a house of the Muses' servants it's not right for there to be lament . . . it would not befit us.
154 The moon was shining full; about the altar they took their stand.
155 To the daughter of Polyanax's house
most courteous greeting.
156 (she) more melodious than a harp, more gold than gold.
158 When anger's spreading through your breast, it's best to keep your yapping tongue in check.
160 Of these things I now make lovely song for pleasure of my friends.

ALCAEUS OR SAPPHO

- 1 I'll see my poor suffering homeland.
4 So, all-surveying Sun, I pray . . .
10 They cowered like birds at a swift eagle suddenly seen.
16 Once Cretan girls used to dance harmoniously like this,
soft-footed about the fair altar . . .
they made for the tender grass.
21a A lad like this came riding into Thebes.
21b Malis was spinning, a fine thread on her spindle.
23 (Temptation?)
gold-gleaming servant of Aphrodite.
25 And I'm on wings, like a child after its mother.
25B Perdition that never has its fill.
35 . . . women
. . . breezes blowing
. . . to dance, lovely Abanthis.
42 . . . scheming Cyprian goddess . . .
. . . messenger from Zeus . . .
. . . come to Makar's island*
. . . solemn oath . . .

Hymns

34        From Pelops' sea-girt land come nigh, great sons of Leda and of Zeus, Castor and Pollux; O consent, appear,
          ye who ride over all the earth and the broad sea on swift-legg'd steeds and rescue men with ease from chilly death, leaping in brightness from afar upon firm-thwarted vessels' masts, on stormy watches bringing the dark ship light.

45        O Hebrus, loveliest of all rivers, that gurgling through Thrace comes out at Aenus to the purple sea, where crowds of girls with tender hands scoop you to sluice their pretty thighs, water divine that kisses them like balm.

307      O lord Apollo, child of mighty Zeus

. . . . .

Castalia, Tritaia's pride.

308 (To Hermes)

Hail, sovereign of Cyllene: thee
I fain would sing, whom Maia bore when Kronos' son, the king of all,
made love to her amid the mountain peaks.

309 (To the Muses?)

For, with the gods' grace, that will bring reward that never fades to those who have you as their guardians.

325      O queen Athena, battle-tried, who . . . by Coronea's . . .
before thy shrine, about [the altar,]
on the Coralius river's banks.

327 (To Eros)

most formidable god,
whom fair-shod Iris bore in love with gold-haired Zephyrus.

386 The holy Graces took you to their bosoms from Kronos.

349 (To Dionysus)

(Hera threw Hephaestus out of heaven. In retaliation he sent her a throne with a hidden trap inside it,) so that none of the gods possibly could free her without his help.

(She sat on it and was caught fast,)

and the immortal gods
all were laughing . . .

Ares declares he can bring Hephaestus by force.

(But he failed. Finally Dionysus overcame Hephaestus with drink and induced him to release his mother, who in gratitude persuaded the gods to admit Dionysus to Olympus as) one of the Twelve.

Well, once that fellow made his coup,
he didn't give such habits up.
He made disturbance every night;
cask after cask rang hollow to the foot.

With such a mother, then, do you claim the esteem that free men have,
from worthy parents born?

331

Melanchrus now deserves respect,
. . . to the town

305a1

. . . Even if you leave that clan, the brew you've mixed . . .

(Trying to reconcile us)

will be like trying to drain the foaming brine.

Myrsilus

305a2

Between us two may no dispute arise, nor . . .

If anyone wants to divide us, Mnemon . . .

208

I can't make out the lie of the winds.
One wave rolls up from one side, one from t'other; we between them toss in our dark vessel, struggling against a furious storm. We've water shipped above the mast-box; you can see all through the sail, it's torn across,
the stays are working slack, the rudder's gone.

. . . . .
. . . . .

. . . Both legs
stay tangled in the ropes—it's only this keeps me from being washed away:
the cargo, walloped off the deck,
floats overhead . . .

6        This wave is higher than the first:
           we'll have a job to bale it out if once it comes aboard . . .

. . . . .
 . . . . .

Let's quickly batten down and run to port.

Let none be soft or slow to move:
       the trials ahead are plain to see.
 Remember last time! Every man be true, let us not shamefully disgrace
       our worthy fathers in their graves, who . . . this town . . .

. . . . .

Let us not bow to one man's rule,
 and let us not accept . . .

73        . . . every piece of freight . . . hugely in the swell.

Buffeted now by wave on wave
       she says she has no heart . . .
       to fight the pouring rain, and so smashed on the unmarked rocks she comes to grief.

Well, that's her lot, and here I'm stuck.
 I'll think no more of getting back,
 I'll just enjoy myself with you,
 and . . . with Bycchis . . .

So even though . . .
       we for the day to come . . .

306 (i)    . . . much sand . . .
           the eczema creeps up, it's spread right through her legs from all these voyages.
 And still it doesn't make her want to be laid up in port . . .

The poet in exile

129

. . . the Lesbians
founded this great, conspicuous precinct for everybody, and set altars of the blest immortals there.

They fixed the names of Suppliant Zeus, of thee, Aeolian goddess,* proud mother of all, and, for the third,
of Dionysus who consumes raw flesh, Semele's son. Come now, all three,
be well disposed and hearken to our prayer: deliver us from these discomforts that our cruel exile brings.

Let Hyrrhas' son* be visited by our friends' vengeance, for we swore stern oaths that none of us would e'er betray a member of our company,
but either lie in cloaks of earth,
killed by those men who then held power, or else put them to death, and save the people from its burden of distress.

But this Potbelly gave no thought to that. He's trampled on his oaths without a qualm, and ravages our city . . .

not by the law that . . .
pale-eyed A[thene(?) . . .
writt[en . . .

Myrsi[lus . . .

130b

Plunged in the wild chaste-woods I live
a rustic life, unhappy me, longing to hear Assembly called and Council, Agesilaïdas!

From lands my grandfather grew old possessing, and my father too, among these citizens who wrong
each other, I've been driven away,

an outland exile: here I dwell like Onomacles,* the Athenian spear-wolf, out of the fray. To make peace with . . . is not wise.

So to the precinct of the gods, treading the dark earth . . .

. . . I live,
 keeping well out of trouble's reach.

Now Lesbos' long-robed girls are here for the beauty-contest. All around, the women's wondrous annual cry,
 the holy alleluia, rings.

When will the gods from all my trials deliver . . .

360 It's like they say Aristodemus said in Sparta once, a quite astute remark:
 a man is what he owns; no pauper is a man of quality or high esteem.

364 Poverty is a hard and unstoppable evil: she,
 with her sister Resourcelessness, conquers a mighty host.

Schemes for action

306g Now we must trust in fortune and jump on Pittacus from behind.

206 But now Athena, daughter of great Zeus, has given courage . . .

. . . set bowls for mixing wine

. . . have you bear that in mind

. . . has become apparent and . . .

. . . till Zeus and Destiny

. . . But fear

249 . . . firm-thwarted ship

. . . better not

. . . hold back the winds.

One should look out before one sails,
 if one is able and has skill,
 but once at sea, one's forced to ride what comes.

- 140     The high hall is agleam with bronze; the roof is all arrayed with shining helmets, and white horse-plumes to ornament men's heads nod from their crests. Bright greaves of bronze to keep strong arrows off cover the unseen pegs,
 and corselets of new linen, and
 a pile of convex shields.
 Chalcidian swords are there,
 and belts in plenty, tunics too.
 We can't forget this store
 now that we've taken on this task.
- 383     Has Tyrrakos' son Dinnomenes still got his gleaming kit in store at Myrrhineum?
- 200     Zeus, Kronos' son, alone controls
 the outcome of events.
- 361     And if Zeus fulfils our scheme . . .
- 314     The immortal gods . . .
 victory to us.
- 391     Whoever are good men of you and us.
- 69       Vexed at our troubles, father Zeus!
           the Lydians pledged two thousand pounds
 if we could get back to our holy town, though we had never helped them, and they knew us not. But that sly fox who called it easy thought we would not guess . . .

Pittacus comes to power

- 332     Now we must drink with might and main,
 get drunk, for Myrsilus is dead!
- 141     This fellow who seeks the high command will soon turn the town upside down: it's poised to tilt.
- 74                     While the log's still only smoking, put the fire out.

348 Fitznobody Pittacus they've made tyrant of that gutless and ill-starred town with united acclaim.

70 But the lyre still plays its sportive part at the symposium:
feasting with empty braggarts . . .
Well, he's now married into the Atreid line;*
let him destroy the city, like he did with Myrsilus, till it's the War-god's will that we take arms. Let's put rage out of mind, and let's wind down this spirit-gnawing strife
of kith and kin that some Olympian's roused, bringing the people to calamity and Pittacus to enviable pomp.

Uncertain context

119       Who gave you cause, you wretch, to say
           ...?
           ... Heaven's not to blame ...
           ... falling short

in nothing: I restrained you from your folly. So take heed of what I say, and stop, and if you can,
keep . . . from the trouble that's at hand.

For your time now is past and gone,
and all your grapes are gathered in,
but it's a good plant, and there's hope it will be bearing many a cluster yet—when the time comes; for from a vine like this . . .

... I'm afraid
that they may pick the fruit before it's ripe.

Even so they who toiled before . . .

306A . . . to us; you do no harm,
since you are gone, killed by the Alliens' blows.

And then you sacrificed (?) us, wretched boy.

As for Amardis, I am unconcerned,
but more upset amid my drinking friends:
and for that bloodshed I am not at all to blame.

337 The first's Antandros the Lelegian town.

344 Yes, I certainly know I'm dislodging a rubble heap, not a stack of squared blocks; so he may get an aching head.

296a He deserves to be flayed more than Antileon.

298 . . . disgracing those who . . . wrong: we ought to set his neck in clamps, and stone him . . .

Much better for the Achaeans if they'd punished Aias' sacrilege* with death: when they were sailing home past Aegae, they'd have had a gentler sea.

For Priam's daughter* in the shrine of Plunderer Athena clasped
the holy image, touched its chin for safety, as the foes swept through the town.

. . . and Deïphobus
they'd slain; loud wailing could be heard from all the people on the walls, and children's screams filled the Dardanian plain.

Then Aias came, crazed fatally, into that shrine of Pallas, who
of all the blessed gods is most implacable to sacrilegious men.

Seizing the maiden in his arms beside the sacred image where she stood, the Locrian dragged her forth, not fearing Zeus's daughter, queen of war.

But she frowned fierce beneath her brows, her face turned livid; out she went over the wine-dark sea, and there began to stir up tempests unforeseen.

Songs about Troy

- 42        They tell that Priam and his sons found yours a bitter marriage-bond, Helen, that sank fair Ilios in flames.
           How different was the graceful bride Aeacus' son* from Nereus' deeps brought home to Chiron's cave, with all the gods guests at the wedding! He undid her virgin waistband: love grew well for Peleus and the flower of Nereids.
- In time she bore a hero son to drive his tawny steeds in pride while Troy and Trojans paid for Helen's sin.
- 44        . . . Pria[m's sons.] (Achilles) . . . called on his mother's name,* on the fairest of sea Nymphs, and in turn she at the knees of Zeus
       made entreaty, that he cure her dear son's anger and discontent.
- 283       and fluttered Argive Helen's heart within her breast. She, crazy for the Trojan cheat-host, sailed away with him, abandoning her daughter dear
           and her rich husband's bed: the child of Zeus and Leda heard the call of love.
           [Now Paris has his due.] The earth full many of his brothers keeps, felled in the Trojan plain because of her..
- Many the chariots that hit the dust, many the bright-eyed lads trampled, as prince Achilles gleed in blood.
- 387       Blood of the royal son of Kronos, Aias, who they say was the noblest hero, after Achilles, [to fight at Troy].
- 388       and shaking a Carian helmet-plume
- 395       Corpse-choked the stream of Xanthus* reached the sea.

Drinking songs

- 38     Drink, be merry with me, Melanippus. What makes you think that, when once you have crossed over eddying Acheron,
        you will ever again get a glimpse of the sun's pure
        light?
        No, don't have big ideas . . .
- So once Sisyphus, Aeolus' son of the royal blood, that most canny of men, had a notion of cheating death,*
        but in spite of his cleverness fate for the second time
        sent him over the eddying waters of Acheron, and the lord of the earth, Kronos' son, for a punishment
        made him labour and toil. But enough of such ponderings.
- While we're young, above all, . . .
        . . . whatever of this must be borne . . .
        . . . north wind . . .
- 50     Slave-boy, trickle the scent over my long-suffering
        head for me,
        and my chest with its grey hairs . . .
        while we're drinking . . .
- 322     From Teian cups the wine-drops fly.
- 333     For wine's the window to see through a man.
- 334         and Poseidon has not yet convulsed the briny sea.
- 335     We must not brood upon our ills,
        Bycchis; repining will not help.
        The best cure's fetching wine and getting drunk.
- 338     Rain in the sky, foul weather coming down,
        the watercourses frozen . . .

Defeat the weather: light a fire,
 mix the sweet wine unstintingly,
 and put a nice soft cushion by my head.

342 Let the vine be the first fruit-tree you plant: others can wait their turn.

343 Water-nymphs, whom they say Zeus of the great aegis on high creates.

346 Let's drink! Why wait for the lamps? Only an inch of day.

Get those bigger cups down, boyo, the fancy ones.
 Wine puts cares out of mind, gift of a god to men, Zeus' and Semele's son. Water it two to one;
 pour them full to the brim, cup after cup, without any gap.

347 Wet your whistle with wine, boyo, the Dog-star's back;
 it's a hard time of year, everything's parched with heat.

Pleasant out of the bush comes the cicada's noise, and the thistle's in flower. Women are dirtiest now, but men are reduced—Sirius dries the sap from their head and their knees . . .

352 Let's drink! The Dog-star's round again.

358 If wine fetters the wits . . .
 Often he hangs his head and blames himself, regretting what he's said, but it's too late to take it back.

359 Child of cliff and foaming sea

. . . . .

O limpet, and you void lads of their wits.*

362 So someone hang around my neck garlands of plaited dill, and pour sweet myrrh down over my chest.

366 Wine, dear boy, and truth go hand in hand.

367 I've heard [the bird that announces] the coming of flowery spring,

so . . .

and mix a bowl of the honey-sweet, quick as ever you can.

- 368 Someone had better invite the delightful Menon
if I'm to enjoy being in on the drinking party.
- 369 Sometimes it's honey-sweet when they draw it off, sometimes it's sharper than teasels.
- 374 Receive a reveller, I pray you, O receive me, I pray.
397 the bloom of (his?) tender fruit
- 401a Greetings: here's a cup to drink.
- 401b Come and drink with me.

Miscellaneous fragments

10 (A woman sings)

Unhappy me, acquainted with all miseries,

. . . . .

. . . a shameful death . . .

For I am victim of a sore disablement;
a frightened deer's cry forms itself within my breast, and raging . . .

. . . perdition . . .

- 380 I fell by the arts of the Cyprian goddess.
- 115 . . . with birds from the lake to this town . . .
from the . . . peaks, from where a fragrant . . .
. . . cool water . . . vine-covered . . .
. . . green reeds . . .
. . . zephyr's bright spring sound . . .

- 117 What you give a whore,
you might as well chuck in the foaming sea.
Whoever knows this not can take my word:
when you consort with whores, it turns out so,
you have to make it up . . .
with shame, accursed misery galore.

- 296b Opportunely the great goddess of love, Damoanaktidas,

breathed down gladness and joy on you by those beautiful olive-trees.

When spring opens its gates, . . . smell of ambrosia
. . . young men
. . . hyacinth-garlanded.

317<sup>a</sup> And you will have your [death?]
in your own hands.

319 The untempestuous breath of feeble winds.
320 and naught would come of aught.

329 His helmet shot with gold,
he nimbly d[ances]

336 Indeed, a blindstorm's snatched your wits away.

341 If you say what you like, maybe you'll hear answers you like much less.

345 What are these birds, come from the World
Stream, from the ends of earth, these wild duck, dapple-necked, soaring on wide-stretched wings?

365 A great big stone, Aisimidas, is set over the head of Tantalus.

372 more martial than Ares.

375 Well, I can't find the witnesses to that.

376 And sitting by Dinnomenes you drain your cup.

377 You've made me forget my woes.

384 O flower-haired, pure, gently smiling sister.

393 Here's the pig provoking us again.

350 (To his brother Antimenidas returning from Babylonian mercenary service)

So you're back from the world's end, with an ivory sword-hilt fastened with gold . . .
great achievement, and you rescued them from distress by dispatching a huge giant, just one palm off five imperial cubits!

354 Achilles, lord of the Scythian land.*

355 'twixt earth and snowy sky.

THEOGNIS

- 11-14     Artemis, huntress born of Zeus, whom Agamemnon
             founded here* as he set sail for Troy, hear thou my prayer, save me from harm: for thee
             it is a small thing, goddess, but so much to me.
- 19-26     When I make verses, Cynrus, have them locked away—
             though if they're stolen, it will always show;
no one will choose the bad where better is to hand,
             and all will say, 'This is Theognis' verse,
from Megara': my name is famous everywhere—
             but some still criticize my statesmanship.
No wonder, Polypaides: not even Zeus, whether he rains or no, can please them all.
- 27-30     I'm well disposed to you; I'll give you good advice that as a boy I learned from men of worth.
Be sensible, and do not stoop to shameful deeds to seize yourself esteem, prestige, or wealth.
- 31-8     So that's that lesson. Next, do not consort with
             knaves,
             but hold fast always to the men of worth:
drink among those, and eat, and sit with those,
             and seek
             their favour, who have wealth and influence.
From sound men you will learn sound lessons: if you mix
             with rogues, you'll even lose what sense you have.
Take this to heart, keep worthy company. Some day
             you'll grant I give my friends the best advice.

39-52     Cynrus, this town's in labour—and I fear it may bring one to birth who'll right our wicked ways.
 The burghers here still keep their heads; their leaders, though,
              are heading for a catastrophic fall.
 No town was ever yet destroyed by men of worth,
              but when the rogues embrace unrighteousness, corrupt the people, and uphold dishonest claims for sake of private gain and influence,
 do not expect that city to stay quiet long,
              even if now it lies in utter calm,
 when things like that are chosen by dishonest
              men—
              gain that comes hand in hand with public ill.
 It leads to civil strife, bloodshed within the clan, dictators. May we never opt for that.

53-68 (+1109-14)

Cynrus, the town's a town still, but it has new folk
              who knew no justice previously, no laws.
 They used to wear old goatskins on their flanks,
              and lived outside the town like deer. And now they are the gentry, Polypaïdes, while yesterday's gentry are dregs. Who can support the sight—the men of worth reviled, the lower class esteemed?
              Good stock now seeks to marry into bad;
 men cheat each other, laughing at each other's loss,
              unable to distinguish good from ill.
 Make none of these your true friend, Polypaïdes,
              for any reason, these who live here now.
 Pretend in speech to be the friend of everyone, but share with no one anything at all that matters, or you'll find those wretched characters
              cannot be trusted in the reckoning.
 They have embraced deceit and lies and subtleties like men past all salvation, past all hope.

- 69-72 Never trust, Cynus, or consult a low-class man
when you have some important goal in view.
To find a good man you must be prepared to go a long way, Cynus, and to take great pains.
- 75-6 Trust few men, Cynus, in a weighty enterprise,
or pain past curing may be your reward.
- 77-8 A trusty man is worth his weight in gold and silver, Cynus, when there's a crisis in the state.
- 79-82 You'll find few comrades, Polypaides, who prove dependable when things are difficult, men who can keep their nerve and bring themselves to share prosperity or hardship equally.
- 91-2 He's a bad comrade, Cynus, who, saying one thing, thinks
another: better enemy than friend.
- 101-12 Let none persuade you, Cynus, to befriend a knave.
What use is a rascal as a friend?
He'll neither get you out of trouble and distress nor let you into any luck he has.
Doing good turns to villains is love's labour lost:
you might as well sow the grey sea with corn.
You'll reap no heavy harvest if your field's the sea,
and no reward from doing good to rogues.
They're always wanting more; and if you once fall short,
all thanks for previous favours drains away,
whereas a man of worth appreciates a boon, remembers, and is grateful evermore.
- 117-18 A false man is the hardest thing to recognize,
Cynus: there's nothing calls for greater care.
- 119-28 False gold or silver is a threat that can be checked, Cynus; an expert quickly finds it out;
but if a comrade's secret disposition's false and in his breast he has an untrue heart, this is the basest counterfeit that God has put before us, and it costs most pain to test.

You cannot know a man's or woman's character until you've tried if it will bear a load, nor can you judge as if inspecting merchandise:
 so often the appearances deceive.

129-30 Don't pray for status, Polypaides, or wealth:
 the only thing a man requires is luck.

131-2 One's parents are the greatest treasure in the world,
 Cynus, for all who value righteousness.

133-42 No one's responsible for his own gain or loss, Cynus: it is the gods that give us both,
 and no man as he toils knows whether in the end
 his enterprise will turn out well or ill.

Often a man who thought he was to fail succeeds,
 while one who thought to be successful fails.

No man is handed everything that he desires;
 it cannot pass the limits of his means.

We mortals have no knowledge, only vain belief;
 the gods fix everything to suit themselves.

143-4 No man has ever cheated guest or suppliant, Cynus, without the immortals taking note.

145-8 Go for a righteous life without much property rather than wealth dishonestly acquired.

All honour, Cynus, is contained in honesty,
 and every honest man's a man of worth.

149-50 Even an utter villain, Cynus, may get wealth from Fortune, but true worth is shared by few.

151-2 Lawless behaviour, Cynus, is what God first gives to villains that he means to sweep away.

159-60 Cynus, don't ever talk too big, for no man knows what change another day and night may bring.

173-8 There's nothing gets a good man down like poverty,

Cynus—not hoary age, nor fever chill.

Throw yourself, Cynus, to the monsters of the deep

to escape it, or leap down the towering cliffs.

A man o'ercome by poverty is powerless in speech and action, and his tongue is tied.

- 179-80 Cross the earth, Cynrus, cross the broad-backed sea likewise,
to find release from painful poverty.
- 181-2 Better, dear Cynrus, for a pauper to be dead than live oppressed by painful poverty.
- 183-92 With horses, rams, and asses, Cynrus, we seek out good blood, and everyone wants pedigree to breed from; yet a man of class, if offered wealth, doesn't mind marrying from worthless stock, nor does a woman turn a base groom down, if he
be rich: she chooses money over worth.
Property's what they value. Good stock breeds from bad
and bad from good; wealth has confounded blood.
Don't be surprised then, Cynrus, that the burghers' stock
is fading: they're diluting good with bad.
- 219-20 Cynrus, don't chafe too much because the town's astir,
but walk the middle of the road, like me.
- 233-4 A man of worth's the witless people's citadel and rampart, Cynrus, yet in slight esteem.
- 235-6 We're looking nothing like survivors any more, Cynrus, but like a city doomed to fall.
- 237-54 For my part, I have made you wings on which to fly
across the endless sea and all the earth with ease: you'll be at every dinner, every feast,
and many a man will have you on his lips,
and lovely lads accompanied by alto pipes will sing of you in voices sweet and clear and orderly. And when, down in the earth's dark nooks,
you go to Hades' house of wailing grief, not even then in death will your fame fade, but
men
will always cherish your immortal name,

Cyrnus, as you roam over all the land of Greece
 and all the islands of the teeming sea, not riding then on horseback; no, the violet-wreathed

Muses will speed you by their noble grace.
 Future men likewise, all who have an interest,
 will sing of you, while earth and sun exist.
 And yet from you I cannot get some slight respect;
 you lie to me as if I were a child.

299-300 When ill befalls a man, none wants to be his friend,
 Cyrnus, though he be of the same womb born.

319-22 A good man, Cyrnus, has a firm and constant mind,
 and holds fast in good fortune and in ill,
 but if God gives a base man livelihood and wealth,
 the fool can't stop his baseness coming out.

323-8 Never destroy a friendship on some trivial ground, Cyrnus, believing wicked slanderous tongues.
 If one were angry with one's friends at every lapse, there'd be no friends, no mutual harmony;
 for lapses are inherent in our mortal world,
 Cyrnus. Only the gods deny them space.

329-30 With planning, even a slow man overtakes the swift, Cyrnus, helped by the justice of the gods.

331-2 Be calm, like me, and walk the middle of the road, Cyrnus: give neither side the other's due.

333-4 Don't help an exile, Cyrnus, hoping for reward.
 Even back home he's not the man he was.

335-6 Don't fuss too much. The mid-position's always best, Cyrnus. You'll still have class: that's hard to steal.

337-40 Zeus grant I may repay my friends, who are so kind,
 Cyrnus, and even more my enemies.
 I'd feel then like a god on earth, could I but get revenge before my appointed death-day comes.

- 355-60    Hold firm amid these setbacks, Cynrus, as before when fortune sent you good things you rejoiced, and just as after good luck bad luck came, so seek to emerge once more by praying to the gods.
            Don't let it show too much. It's bad to let it show;
            you have few sympathizers for your plight.
- 361-2     A man's heart dwindles, Cynrus, when disaster strikes,
            but when he gets revenge it grows again.
- 367-70 +1183-4
            There's no man, Cynrus, that the sun's rays look upon
            who is not with some criticism tagged,
            but I can't understand the city's attitude:
            they're hostile whether I do right or wrong.
            Yes, plenty criticize me, both good men and base,
            but not one of the fools can match my style.
- 371-2     Don't ply the goad and force me, Cynrus, to the yoke,
            pulling me too far into comradeship.
- 409-10    No greater treasure, Cynrus, will you leave your sons
            than modesty, which clings to men of class.
- 411-12    Cynrus, that friend is held inferior to none who is endowed with both good sense and means.
- 429-38    It's easier to beget and rear a man than put good sense in him. No one has yet devised a way to make a fool wise, or a bad man good.
            If God had granted the Asclepiads* this power, to cure men's baseness and their blighted wits,
            they would be earning many a handsome fee.
            If man's mind could be crafted and put into place,
            no son of worthy sire would be a knave:
            he'd heed his words of wisdom. But one cannot teach
            a scoundrel to become respectable.

1101-2 + 539-40

Whoever counselled you about me and advised forsaking my companionship, this man,
dear Cynrus, is but forging shackles for himself,
unless my judgement's clouded by the gods.

541-2 Cynrus, I fear that lawlessness may kill this town
as it did the brutish Centaurs long ago.

543-6 I'll have to judge this case exactly by the rule, Cynrus, and give both sides their equal shares with help from seers and auguries and altar flames, so that no error puts me in disgrace.

549-53 The silent messenger* stirs woeful war to life,
Cynrus, from yon high look-out blazing forth.
So saddle up your steeds: I think they'll meet the foe—
it is not far—already on the road.

631-2 The man whose head can't rule his heart is ever found
in trouble, Cynrus, and perplexity.

653-4 May I have heaven's favour and the gods' good will,
Cynrus. I crave no status otherwise.

655-6 At your misfortune, Cynrus, all of us feel pain;
but troubles not one's own are soon forgot.

805-10 An envoy sent to Delphi, Cynrus, must take care to be more true than scale or rule or lathe, that man to whom the priestess of the god imparts
the oracle from out the wealthy shrine.
Any addition would negate the remedy,
and any cut would be a sacrilege.

811-14 I've suffered something worse than—well, not ugly death,
but bitterer, Cynrus, than all other fates.
My friends have let me down. So I must go and try
my enemies, to see how they're disposed.

815-17 An ox's mighty hoof upon my tongue prevents my currying favour, though I know the art,

- Cyrnus. And after all, what destiny ordains that one must suffer, cannot be escaped.
- 819-20   Cyrnus, we've reached a crisis oft foreseen in prayers.
          Now may one death embrace the two of us.
- 821-2    There's little place for people who show disrespect to parents, Cyrnus, when they're getting old.
- 833-6    It's all gone to the dogs, to ruin, and we can't blame any of the immortal blessed gods, Cyrnus. It's human violence, graft, and insolence have cast us from success to misery.
- 895-6    Sense is the best thing that a man can have in him, Cyrnus; insensibility the worst.
- 897-900   Cyrnus, if God were angry at each little thing with mortals, knowing each man's private thoughts
          and all his actions, then it would go hard for us, both righteous and unrighteous men alike.
- 1027-8   Disaster's easy to achieve in men's affairs, Cyrnus, but hard the skill of making good.
- 1037-8   It is the hardest thing to cheat a man of worth, Cyrnus. This view I came to long ago.
- 1103-4   Lawlessness broke Magnesia, Smyrna, Colophon, Cyrnus: it's bound to break you people too.
- 1133-4   Cyrnus, while friends are by, let's check the ill at start
          and seek to cure the ulcer ere it grows..
- 1171-6   Sense, Cyrnus, is the gods' best gift to mortal men:
          sense truly has the tabs on everything.
Lucky's the man who has it—far to be preferred to accursed lawlessness or too much wealth.
That is a bane to mortals, there is nothing worse.
          From such things, Cyrnus, comes all misery.
- 1177-8   Could you touch not base deeds and stay untouched by them, Cyrnus, you might best know the good man's life.

1179-80 Cynrus, respect the gods and fear them. This is what restrains a man from impious word and deed.

1197-1202

O Polypaides, I hear the crane's shrill cry telling men that it's time to plough and sow.
 It stabs my melancholy heart with pain, to think my flower-bright farmland lies in other hands and I've no mules at work pulling the crooked plough

1217-18 Perhaps one day he'll moan, and we'll sit by and grin,
 Cynrus, rejoicing in our own success.

1219-20 Cynrus, it's difficult to trick one's enemy,
 but easy for a friend to cheat a friend.

1221-2 Mortal men's calculation, Cynrus, tends to make many a slip when judgement is disturbed.

1223-4 There's nothing, Cynrus, more unjust than wrath:
 it gives
 the heart that shelters it ill recompense.

1225-6 There's nothing sweeter, Cynrus, than a goodly wife.
 I can attest it: test it out yourself.

1353-5 Bitter and sweet is love, desirable and cruel to young men, Cynrus, till it be fulfilled.
 If one succeeds, then it is sweet; but if pursuit finds no success, there is no sharper pain.

SOLON

*Salamis**

- 1 I bring my own dispatch from lovely Salamis, adopting ordered verse instead of speech.
- 2 In that case I would rather be from Sikinos or Pholegandros,* no Athenian, for soon the word would go about, 'He's one of those Athenian Salamis-abandoners.'
- 3 Let's start for Salamis, fight for the lovely isle and free ourselves from terrible disgrace.

Other political poems

- 4 Our state will never fall by Zeus's ordinance or the immortal blessed gods' intent:
such a stout-hearted guardian, she of the mighty sire,
Pallas Athene, holds her hand above:
but by their foolishness the citizens themselves seek to destroy its pride, from avarice, with the unprincipled mob-leaders, who are set to suffer badly for their great misdeeds.
They know not how to prosper modestly, enjoy in festive peace the happiness they have.
- . . . . .
- and they grow wealthy by unrighteousness.
[When wicked men . . .]
and, sparing neither sacred property nor public, seize by plunder, each one what he can,
careless of Righteousness's august shrine—the silent one, who knows what is and has been done,
and comes at last to claim the payment due—

this aims a sure blow at the whole community, and soon it comes to wretched slavery which rouses war from sleep, and strife within the clan,

and sunders many from their lovely youth.
For if men injure their own people, they soon find their lovely city scarred and faction-torn.

Among the populace these evils roam at large,
and many of the poor folk find themselves in foreign lands, sold into slavery and bound in shameful bonds . . .

And so the public ill comes home to every man:
the yard doors are no more disposed to hold;
it leaps the high wall, and it finds him out for sure,
though he take refuge in his inmost room.

This lesson I desire to teach the Athenians:

Lawlessness brings the city countless ills,
while Lawfulness sets all in order as is due;
many a criminal it puts in irons.

It makes the rough smooth, curbs excess, effaces wrong,

and shrivels up the budding flowers of sin;
it straightens out distorted judgements, pacifies
the violent, brings discord to an end, brings to an end ill-tempered quarrelling. It makes all men's affairs correct and rational.

4a I mark—and sorrow fills my heart upon the sight—the eldest country of Ionia* listing.

4c And as for you, who now have all the wealth you want,
make the stern spirit gentler in your hearts, adjust to moderation. We will not accept this state of things, nor will it work for you.

5 The commons I have granted privilege enough, not lessening their estate nor giving more;
the influential, who were envied for their wealth,
I have saved them from all mistreatment too.

I took my stand with strong shield covering both sides,
allowing neither unjust dominance.

- 6 Thus would the commons and its leaders best accord,
not given too free a rein, nor pushed too hard.
Surplus breeds arrogance, when too much wealth attends
such men as have no soundness of intent.

- 7 Hard to please everyone in politics.

- 9 As from the cloudbank comes the storm of snow or hail,
and thunder follows from the lightning flash, exalted men portend the city's death: the folk in innocence fall slave to tyranny.
Raise them too high, and it's not easy afterwards to hold them. Now's the time to read the signs.

- 10 A short time now will show the Athenians how mad
I am,* when truth comes out for all to see.

- 11 If by your own fault you have suffered grief and harm,
put no part of the blame upon the gods.
You raised these men up,* by providing bodyguards,
and that's why wretched slavery's your lot.
Your trouble is, each of you treads the fox's way,
but your collective wits are thin as air.
You watch a crafty fellow's tongue, and what he says,
but fail to look at anything he does.

- 12 It's by the winds the sea's disturbed: if nobody stirs it, it stays of all things best-behaved.

- 13 Bright daughters of Olympian Zeus and Memory, Pierian Muses, hearken to my prayer.
Grant me that I have fortune from the blessed
gods,
and good repute from all men all the time;

may I be honey to my friends, gall to my foes,
 honoured on sight or feared respectively.
 Wealth I desire, but not to hold unrighteously, for surely sometime retribution comes.
 The riches that the gods give are dependable from top to bottom of the storage jar, but those that mortals cultivate with violence come awkward and unwilling at the call of crime, and soon are tangled in calamity, which from a small beginning grows like fire,
 a trifling thing at first, but grievous in the end,
 for mortal violence does not live long.
 Zeus supervises every outcome. Suddenly like a March wind he sweeps the clouds away, a gale that stirs the billowing ocean to its bed and ravages the tidy fields of wheat before ascending to the gods' high seat in heaven, and then, behold, the sky is clear again:
 the strong sun shines out on the fertile countryside
 in beauty; not a cloud remains to see.
 Such is the punishment of Zeus. He does not flare at every insult, like a mortal man, but all the time he is aware whose heart is marked with sin, and in the end it shows for sure.
 One pays at once, another later; and if some escape the gods' pursuing fate themselves, it comes sometime for sure: the innocent will pay—
 their children, or their later family.
 Whether of high or low degree, we mortals think our various vanities are running well until some blow falls; then we moan. But up to then we take fond pleasure in our empty hopes.
 Whoever is oppressed by comfortless disease gets the idea he will return to health.
 A man of low esteem imagines it is high;
 an ill-shaped man is proud of his good looks;
 propertyless, and in the grip of poverty,
 he still has fancies of acquiring wealth.
 They bustle on their different ways: one roams the
 sea

hoping to bring some profit home from trade, tossed by tempestuous winds where fishes wait below,
with no concession made to life and limb.
Another carves the soil—his business is the plough—
and slaves away till fruit-time ends the year;
another's learnt Athena's and Hephaestus' craft,*
and earns a living by his handiwork.
Another has been taught the Olympian Muses' boon,
skilled in the rules of lovely poesy;
another one the lord Apollo's made a seer,
who sees disaster coming from afar,
if he is favoured by the gods; but what is doomed
no augury or sacrifice averts.
Others are healers, Paeon's office, well resourced in drugs: they too can give no guarantees.
Often a minor pain becomes an agony that cannot be relieved by soothing drugs, whereas another, crazed by terrible disease,
under the doctor's hands is quickly cured.
Fate brings to mortal men both good and ill: the gifts
the immortals give are inescapable.
There's risk in every undertaking. No one knows, when something starts, how it will finish up.
One man makes noble efforts, but despite them
all
falls into unforeseen calamity;
another handles ill, yet God gives him complete success, freed from his folly's consequence.
But as to wealth, no limit's laid down clear for
men,
since those among us who possess the most strive to earn double. Who could satisfy them all?
Remember, profit's in the immortals' gift, but loss's source is in men's selves: when sent by Zeus
to punish them, it comes to each in turn.

- 14 Nor yet is any mortal fortunate, but all are wretched that the sun looks down upon.
- 15 For many curs are rich, and men of class are poor,
but we'll not take their riches in exchange for our nobility, which always stays secure, while wealth belongs to different men by turns.
- 16 But wisdom's hidden formula, which holds the key to all things, is the hardest to discern.
- 17 The gods' intent is hidden every way from man.
- 18 As I grow old I'm always learning more.
- 19 (To Philocyprus, king of Soloi in Cyprus)
But now I wish you many years of life and rule in Soloi here, you and your family:
to me may Cypris* of the violet garland grant
a safe, swift voyage from this famous isle.
Favour and glory on this settlement may she bestow, and fair return to my own land.
- 20* 'I pray my death may catch me at threescore years'
If you'll still listen to me, take that out—don't mind me having wiser thoughts than you—
and change it, Ligyastades, and sing,
'I pray my death may come at fourscore years.'
- 21 Nor may my death come unlamented: when I die,
I want to leave my friends with grief and groans.
- 22a And please tell tawny-haired young Critias* to heed
his father—he'll be taking no bad guide.
- 23 Happy the man who has his sons, his hounds,
his horses, and a friend from foreign parts.
- 24 Equally rich is he who has abundance of silver, gold, and acres under plough, horses and mules, and he that only has the means to eat well, couch well, and go softly shod,
and by and by enjoy a lad's or woman's bloom,
with youth and strength still his to suit his need.

This is a man's true wealth: he cannot take all those possessions with him when he goes below.

No price he pays can buy escape from death, or grim

diseases, or the onset of old age.

25 While youth's delight still flowers, and one loves a
lad,

sweet lips and thighs the object of desire.

26 But now I like the gods of love and wine and song and what they do for human happiness.

27 A boy, an ungrown child, in seven years puts forth a line of teeth and loses them again;

but when another seven God has made complete,
the first signs of maturity appear.

In the third hebdomad he's growing yet, his chin is fuzzy, and his skin is changing hue, while in the fourth one, each achieves his peak of

strength,

the thing that settles whether men are men.

The fifth is time a man should think of being wed
and look for sons to carry on his line;

and by the sixth he's altogether sensible,
no more disposed to acts of fecklessness.

With seven hebdomads and eight—fourteen more
years—

wisdom and eloquence are at their peak, while in the ninth, though he's still capable, his tongue

and expertise have lost some of their force.

Should he complete the tenth and reach the measured line,

not before time he'd have his due of death.

28 There I dwelt
at the Nile's mouth, hard by Canopus' shore.

29 Poets say much that's false.

30 Rulers must be obeyed, however right or wrong.

31 First let us pray to Zeus, to Kronos' son the king, to grant these laws success and high prestige.

32 (To Phocus)

If I have spared
my country, if I've not disgraced my name
by grasping brute force and dictatorship, I'm not ashamed: this way I think I'll win more people over.

33

I know many people say
'Solon is a stupid fellow, not a man who thinks ahead:
God has offered him a fortune, but he hasn't taken it.
There he had the prey encircled, but he didn't close the net—
lost his nerve, no doubt about it, and his common sense as well.
I'd not mind, if I'd seized power and the city's lavish wealth
and become the lord of Athens even for a single
day,
being flayed to make a wineskin, with my family wiped out.'

34

Others came along for plunder. They had hopes of being rich,
every one of them expecting he would make his fortune there
and that I, for all my cooing, would reveal a harsh intent.
After those vain calculations now they're furious
with me,
and they all look sideways at me, just as if I were their foe—
wrongly. The decrees I uttered had the blessing of the gods,
and I took no foolish further measures, since I have no taste
by dictator's force to . . . or to see our fruitful land portioned out to good-for-nothings equally with men of worth.

- 36 Those aims for which I called the public meeting—which of them, when I stopped, was still to achieve?

I call as witness in the court of Time
the mighty mother of the Olympian gods, dark Earth, from whom I lifted boundary-stones*
that did beset her—slave before, now free.
And many to Athena's holy land
I brought back, sold abroad illegally or legally, and others whom their debts had forced to leave, their speech no longer Attic, so great their wanderings; and others here in ugly serfdom at their masters' mercy
I set free. These things I did in power, blending strength with justice, carried out all that I promised. I wrote laws for all, for high and low alike, made straight and just.
But if another man had got the goad,
someone imprudent or acquisitive, he'd not have checked the mob. If I'd agreed to what the opposition favoured then,
and then to what the other party thought,
this city would be mourning many dead.
Therefore I turned to guard my every side,
a wolf at bay amid a pack of hounds.

- 37 If I must spell out where the mob's at fault, they never would have dreamt what they have now

. . . . .

while all the bigger and the stronger men would then approve of me and call me friend.
For if another man had got the goad, he'd not have checked the mob, or been content until he'd churned the milk and lost the cream.
I marked the frontier in the No Man's Land between these warring parties.

- 38 . . . they drink; and some of them eat cakes,
some bread, and others pastries mixed with lentils.
Nor are they lacking any sort of bake that the dark earth provides for mortal men, but everything is freely there at hand.

39-40

Some run for the mortar,
others for pickles, or for vinegar,
or pomegranate-seeds, or sesame.

ATTRIBUTED TO HOMER: MARGITES

- 1        There came to Colophon a wonderful old bard, page of the Muses and Apollo, Archer-god,
with a melodious lyre in his hands.
- 2 (About Margites)
The gods had never taught him how to plant or sow
or any other skill: he failed at every craft.
- 3        He knew a lot of things, but never knew them right.
- 5*                    The fox knows lots of tricks,
the hedgehog only one—but it's a winner.
- 7        . . . bladder (?). Hand outstretched, [he took his dick and set it to] the pot, and thrust
[it in. Now in two] pinches he was caught:
[his hand was stuck,] he could not get it out,
[and he was bursting.] Well, he soon pissed in the pot
. . . he had a new idea:
. . . flung the doors open, and rushed out
. . . through the dark of night [seeking to free his dick] and free his hand.
. . . through the dark of night
. . . [he r]an without a torch
. . . unlucky he[ad]
. . . thought it was a stone
. . . and with forceful hand
. . . [sma]shed the pot [thereon.]

*The Song of Geryon**

- S 14 [None of the gods] remained by Zeus
the lord of all.
- Then did pale-eyed Athena speak to her stern-hearted uncle Poseidon, god of horse-ways:
'Remember the promise you made,
[and do not seek to save] Geryones from death.'
- 184 (S 7)
. . . his cowherd Eurytion, born of . . .
on the mainland, across from famed Erythea, by the boundless silver-veined waters of Tarshish river*
in a cave in the rock.
- S 8 Over the waves of the salty deep they came to the beautiful Isle of the Gods, where the Hesperides have their golden houses.

S 13 (Geryones' parents appeal to him not to fight Heracles)

' . . . my unhappy motherhood, unhappy fate.
Now I beg you, Geryones,
if ever I gave you my nipple

[She drew apart her frag]ant robe . . .

S 11 [With these words he] reached out . . .
He spoke in answe[er, the powerful son]
[of im]mortal [Chrysaor and Callirhoe:]

'Do not try to frighten me [by speaking of icy de]ath, and do not . . .

Perhaps my [lineage makes me immortal, un]aging, [fit to live] in Olympus:

if so, better [to fight and avoid] reproach

[than to look on while the cattle]

[are pl]undered from my [stalls.]

Or if, dea[r father, all that's left]

[for me is] carrying on into old age

as one of those who live fr[om day to day,]

[cut off fr]om the blessed gods,

then now's the finest time to face my destiny

[and save you] and all our kin from disgrace with men of the future [who tell]

of the son of Chrysaor—

may that not be the choice of the blessed gods.

. . . fight for my cattle . . .'

S 15 . . . debated in his mind

. . . to be best by far

to . . . and fight by stealth against an enemy of such great might.

. . . he planned

a bitter end for him.

. . . held his shield before

. . . and from his head

. . . the horsehair plume

. . . upon the ground.

(13 lines lost)

(Heracles' arrow) bearing on its head
 a charge of horrid death,
 being besmeared with blood and . . . gall,
 the torments of the deadly Hydra's darting heads.
 In silent stealth he drove it in his brow, cleaving the flesh and bones
 by fortune's dispensation.
 Straight through to his skull-top the shaft kept course,
 and spoiled with crimson blood
 his cuirass and his gory limbs.
 Geryones bent his neck aslant even as a poppy whose delicate structure decays, and its petals soon fall.

185 (S 17)

As the mighty Sun-god stepped into his bowl of gold, to cross the river of World's End to the holy deeps of Night to his mother, his wedded wife, his dear children, the son of Zeus took his way*
 into the laurel-shaded grove.

181 (S 19)

Then Heracles took the goblet, a three-flagon measure,
 that Pholos* had mixed and served him,
 and drank with application.

187 They showered quinces on the king's wedding car,
 they showered myrtle leaves,
 rose-garlands, crinkled wreaths of violet.

193(b) Gold-wingèd virgin Muse . . .

192 This tale they tell's not true:
 you did not sail in those benched ships or come to the towers of Troy.

S 105 . . . the Danaans eagerly sprang from the horse

 Apollo [abided no longer in] holy [Ilios,] nor Artemis, nor Aphrodite

Returns of the Heroes

209* The lady Helen [cried out] at the sudden sight of the heavenly sign,
 and these were her words to Odysseus' son:
 'Telemachus, this is surely some messenger from
 on high,
 flown down through the fathomless air and gone screeching away with the voice of killing death.
 Even thus will Odysseus appear in your house
 . . . by the will of Athena.
 [But if you thin]k "this is but a chattering crow"
 [set off for ho]me, I will not hold you here.
 Penelope [will rejoice] to see you,
 son of the man she loves.'

The Orestes saga

210 Join me, Muse, in rejecting stories of battle, and celebrate weddings of gods and banquets of
 men
 and feasts of the blessed.
 211 when the swallow in springtime rings out.
 212 Such are the lovely-haired Graces' gifts to the public
 that we must sing, devising an elegant Phrygian melody,
 at the arrival of spring.

217 (Apollo to Orestes)

'I will give you this bow,* informed by all my arts,
 for victory in shooting.'

- 219* She dreamed a serpent came, with a bloody wound on the crown of its head; and out of that fleet-footed Procaon and Clytius went.

From Larisa came Eurytion, the son of long-robed . . .
and the fierce son of Elatus

On one side sat the Locrian spearsmen
. . . the dear sons of . . .
trusty Achaeans . . . and proud . . .
and those who dwelt in Boeotia's holy acres;
while on the other side the Dryopes and steadfast Aetolians . . .

*The Sons of Oedipus**

- 222b (Jocasta speaking)

'Do not add to my woes the burden of worry, or raise grim prospects for my future life.'

For the immortal gods
have not ordained for men on this holy earth unchanging enmity for all their days,
no more than changeless love;
they set men's outlook for the day.

As to your prophecies, I pray the lord Apollo will not fulfil them all;

but if I am destined to see my sons slain by each other, if the Fates have so dispensed, then may death's ghastly close be mine straightway before I can ever behold
the terrible moaning and tears of such woes,

my sons killed in the house or the city fallen.

But come, dear sons, and hearken to my words.
Here's how I declare the outcome for you:
one to have the palace and live by [the streams of Dirce], the other to go hence, taking all your dear father's gold and property—whichever of you two draws the first lot by Destiny's design.

This, I think, should prove the way to free you from an evil fate
as this godly seer foretells, if truly Kronos' son [is to preserve] King Cadmus' people and city, and put off to later times whatever ill is fated for our clan.'

So spoke the lady with appeasing words, seeking to check her sons from combat in the house,
and the seer Teiresias supported her.
They agreed to do . . .

(38 lines fragmentary)

. . . cattle and horses
. . . portion.

. . . what is destined to happen.
[Make your way to the house] of King Adrastus;
he will receive you, and give his lovely daughter
. . . and his people will give . . .'

(12 lines fragmentary)

So spoke the famous [Teiresias], and at once the hero
departed from the house.
[The finest captains] of Thebes [escorted] Polynices their friend.

He went upon his way, passed through the mighty wall
. . . with him . . .

[By the gods'] guidance they reached the Isthmus,
the sea-[god's . . . with pr]ayers;

Then [they passed] Corinth's fair settlements,
and soon they came to [well-built] Cleonae.

223                               because Tyndareos once, when making sacrifice to all the gods, forgot but one—the Cyprian who bestows such amiable blessings. She in wrath made his daughters twice- and thrice-marriers, deserters of their men.*

232                               Truly, above all Apollo loves amusement, song and dance;
grief and lament are Hades' affair.
233       Shining in armour the new-born Pallas sprang on to the broad earth.

235       Poseidon, the commander

240       Come, hither, Calliope pure of voice.

243                               And the slim javelins they hurled also.

244       For it is fruitless, it is helplessness, to weep for the dead.

IBYCUS

282

. . . the famous and prosperous city of Dardanid Priam they ravaged, coming from Argos
by mighty Zeus' decision

in conflict well known to the poets as woeful battle they waged for Helen's auburn beauty, and Ruin climbed up to long-suffering Pergamos
thanks to the Love-goddess golden-haired.

But I'm not concerned now with singing of Paris
the cheat-host, nor yet of Cassandra slender of ankle
and Priam's other children,

or high-gated Troy's day of capture, ill-omened, nor yet will I take as my subject heroes of valour
and pride, whom ships full-bellied,

much-riveted, brought for the downfall of Troy, those warriors brave whom mighty Agamemnon commanded, the Pleisthenid leader and sovereign,
excellent son sprung of Atreus' stock.

Those topics the skilled Heliconian Muses could easily cover in story, but a mere mortal
could never tell the details of all of the ships that set sail out of Aulis across the Aegean from Argos out to the horse-plains of Troy, and sailing in them

the bronze-shielded sons of Achaea.
The best of them with the spear

was fleet-of-foot Achilles and great Telamonian Ajax the powerful . . . fire.

But as to the handsomest man of the Argives who travelled to Troy, [Cyani]ppus

. . . . .
 . . . . .

[and also Zeuxippus, whom] Hyllis gold-girdled gave birth to; his eye-catching beauty Trojans and Danaans
 compared with Troilus's,

like thrice-refined orichalc pitted against the splendour of gold.
 Their beauty is for ever;
 and you too shall have fame undying, Polycrates,*
 if we trust song and my own reputation.

S 166 . . . they sang to the pipes
 . . . luxury
 . . . [year]ning as of love.

. . . . .

The powers above bestow [lasting] prosperity on whom they choose; for others [the reverse]
 by Destiny's design.

[Quickly] the chieftains assembled with the Tyndarids, when to the trumpet's command for [Castor] breaker of horses and p[ugilist Pollux] their godlike [followers rallied,] and the great gold-aegis [Athena escorted them all]
 on their way to woe[ful war.]

But that cannot be told [except] by children of [the immortals]; whereas you
 . . . fairest of men on earth
 the sun looks down upon, godlike in form.
 No other is so . . .
 either among Ionians or . . .

. . . dwell in Lacedaemon, land of fine men . . .

... with dancing and horses . . .
 Here one can gaze on the deep Eurotas, and round about, a marvel of beauty,
 . . . leafy groves of firs]
 . . . gardens

where they wrestle and run . . .
 . . . train[ed] for the foot-race . . .

S 220        sweet pretension of love . . .
 as if to one toiling in the race . . .

S 221        May this toil ever be mine.
 And if someone finds fault with me behind my back, I boast of that still more
 . . . dark grudging . . .

S 222        [? smite me with a] club . . .
 Not even were he cloaked
 in the darkling woes of Oedipus or Ino would he be deprived of his passion.

S 223(a)    [flew] up from the earth to [the peak], cleaving the airy deep.

S 224 (Troilus)
 that lad like to the gods,
 whom he slew outside the towers of Ilios.

S 257(a) fr. 1
 . . . songs praising you. Amid delightful rosebuds, Charm, you raised him by the shrine of Aphrodite;
 fragrant the [flowers,] I must deem,
 from which attentively she did anoint the boy,
 and tender beauty was his gift
 from those two goddesses.

But Equity [stayed out of that festivity:]
 therefore I am weighed down, and pass my sleepless nights with mind astir.

S 257 (a) fr. 27

The pipe . . .
 An ornate so[ng distils]
 from the Pierian Muses [into my mind;]
 and in it I'll sing of a lad . . .
 eyes . . . downy . . .
 when early Dawn of the white . . .
 [goes] up into [heaven to bring]
 [light for mortals] and gods . . .

S 257 (a) fr. 29+31

Eros . . . the girl . . .
 unless he went down to her chamber one day and was thoroughly tinged in his melting heart with his expert mother's sweet gift of desire.
 Happy is he who can bring her the favour

283 And he sat for a long time, paralysed by amazement.

285 Again, I killed the white-horsed sons of Moliona,*
 alike in age and features, one in body,
 both born together in a white-skinned egg.

286 In spring the Cydonian quince-trees watered from freshets of rivers where Nymphs have their virginal gardens blossom, and vine-shoots are growing under the shade of the branches;
 but Love in me at no season is laid to rest.
 Like the North Wind of Thrace that comes blazing with lightning, he rushes upon me, sent by the Cyprian goddess with withering frenzies, dark-lowering, undaunted, and from the foundations
 he overwhelms and devastates my heart.

287 Once again Love, as he looks at me meltingly under dark eyelashes, tries to induce me with every enticement to enter the Cyprian goddess's endless hunting-net.

By heaven, I tremble upon his approach like a champion horse who is feeling his age and is led once again to the chariot-yoke for a race.

288 Euryalus, scion of blue-eyed Graces, darling of lovely-haired spirits of ripeness,
the Cyprian goddess and soft-eyed Temptation raised you in beds of roses.

289b And he soars in the unfamiliar void.

298 Heracles, Zeus' defender with the supreme father's daughter, doughty Pallas;
for Zeus himself gave birth to her—
she sprang from the crown of his head.

302 He lay with Cadmus' daughter.

303a [As long as] mortals talk of the blue-eyed Cassandra, Priam's daughter with lovely tresses.

303(b) When the wakeful sonorous morning twilight rouses the nightingales.

310 I fear I may do some wrong by the gods in accepting such honour from men.

311 [if someone] with Strife's uncontrollable mouth

312 to swallow thick eddies of rain.

313 Once men have passed away, then there's no cure to be found to bring back life.

314 Ablaze, like the sparkling stars through the hours

315 Myrtle, violet, helichryse, apples, roses, and gentle bay.

316 They . . . undoing their gay embroidered

317(a) On its topmost leaves sit ornate, dapple-throated wild duck and purpleflash, long-winged kingfishers.

317(b) . . . me always, my heart,

330 If it keeps clear of the wave-tops,
no rope comes to harm.
335 War-dancers steadfast in the clash of arms.
336 The slender pillars of the sky.
339 The Laconian girls, who show their thighs.

ANACREON

346 fr. 1(a)

but your heart's a-flutter on another, O boy of the beautiful face.

And your [mother] fancies she has you closeted [at home,] whereas you [are secretly roaming abroad]
in the fields of hyacinth, where the Cyprian from her yoke has fastened her . . . steeds.

But you smashed [your chariot]
in the middle [of the race—]
[the car] that has half of the town in suspense.

346 fr. 1(b)

Herotima, you public, public road.

346 fr. 4

And I was sparring with a hard [partner; but now] I look up and lift my head.
[To . . .] I owe much gratitude
. . . having escaped from Love
. . . altogether, and . . .
. . . harsh bonds due to Aphrodite.
. . . must bring wine . . . jar(s)
. . . and bring water that splashes . . .

347

. . . and the hair that shaded your delightful neck.*
Now you're sneaped: that hair has fallen into scurvy hands, cascaded
all at once into the dirt, ill-met with the blade of iron, and I'm heartsick: what's to do, if even pleas for Thrace don't work?
As I hear, that famous lady is distraught, and keeps repeating,
as she rails against her lot,

'How I wish you'd take me, mother,
to the cruel sea, and drop me in the surging purple waves.'

348 Shooter of deer, I supplicate you, Artemis, Zeus's fair-haired daughter, mistress of beasts of the wild.

Now by the waters of Lethaeus*
you must be looking down with pleasure
on a city of men bold-hearted:
they are no wild and untamed people that you have for your flock.

349 Here he is carping again at the men of Ialysus with their sable shields.

351 They wantonly harass the doorman.

352 The amiable Megistes ten months now wears osier wreaths and drinks the honeysweet must.

353 Confabulators across the island, Megistes, are running the holy city.

354 And you will make me
the talk of the neighbours.

355 Tantalus' talents
he weighs in his balance.

356(a) Come, boy, bring us a bowl
so I can drink a sponce.
Pour in ten ladlesful
of water, five of wine,
so I can bacchanize
once more with no disgrace.

356(b) Come now, this time let's drink not in this Scythian style with din and uproar, but sip to the sound of decent songs.

357 Lord, with whom the frisky Eros sports, and the dark-eyed Nymphs, and the pink-glowing goddess of love,
as you roam across the mountains' lofty summits, I make supplication to you, to come with kindly favour to hear my gracious prayer:

stand by Cleobulus, and be his wise adviser, O Dionysus:
make him accept my love.

358 Once again the gold-haired Eros targets me with his crimson playball and invites me to sport with a certain braided-sandalled girl.

But she, being from the noble island of Lesbos, only turns her nose up at my white hair; she is gawping after some other lass.

359 Cleobulus is who I love, Cleobulus I'm mad about,
Cleobulus I ogle.

360 O lad with the look of a lass,
I seek you, but you don't heed,
not knowing you hold the reins of my soul, my life.

361 Myself, I wouldn't want to have the Horn of Plenty, or to be king of Tarshish for a hundred and fifty years.

362 We're into the midwinter month;
the cloud's heavy with rain, the rough storms rumble.

363 Why then do you fly with your chest that's hollower than a pipe anointed with sweet myrrh?

368 You wheel towards Leucippe.

364 For Thargelius says
you throw a neat discus.

366 But O my Smerdies, that have got yourself scrubbed out over and again.

367 For you were obdurate regarding me.

370 Neither my tender sister . . .

- 371 Nor am I even-tempered or nice to my fellow men.
- 372 And auburn Eurypyle's interested in that litter-borne Artemon.
- 373 For breakfast I broke off a bit of sweet sesame cake;
I've drunk a whole flagon of wine, and in luxury
now
I play my sweet harp, making merry beside my dear girl.
- 374 I pluck my twenty-stringed harp, striking an octave chord;
and you just are, young Leucaspis.
- 375 Who can turn his mind to the loveliness of youth, and dance to the slender half-hole pipes?
- 376 Once more I leap up from the White Cliff, drunk with love, and plunge in the foaming waves.
- 377 And the Mysians
discovered mare-mounting by asses.
- 378 Well, I'm flying up to heaven on airy wings due to love, because . . . won't share his youth
with me.
- 379 Love, seeing me with greying beard, flies past;
I feel the draught of his gold-gleaming wings.
- 380 All hail, dear light, smiling with lovely face.
- 381 Dropping my shield by a fair river's banks.
- 382 And took to heart the tearful spear.
- 383 The slave-girl served honeysweet wine into a three-measure goblet.
- 384 Nor had Persuasion begun at that time to shine with a silvery light.
- 385 (A woman sings)
I'm just coming back from the river with all my washing clean.
- 386 I noticed Simalus in the dance holding a pretty harp.

- 387 I asked the perfumer Strattis if he was going to grow any hair.
- 388 He used to wear a rough cloak, pinched in at the waist,
and wooden baubles in his ears, and round his ribs
a hairless cowhide, the unwashed covering off a cheap shield; and he used to go with baker-women and with rent-boys on the make,
seeking a phoney livelihood.
- His neck was often in the stocks or on the rack, his back flogged with a rawhide whip, his hair and beard
plucked out, the 'poor wretch' Artemon.
- And now he wears gold ear-rings, rides about in traps,
'Koisyra's son',* and holds an ivory sunshade up,
as ladylike as anything.
- 389 You're a hospitable girl:
I'm thirsty, let me drink!
- 390 The lovely-haired daughters of Zeus danced lightly there.
- 391 But now the city's crown of walls is gone.
- 392 It's not our sort of thing, and not attractive.
- 393 The vexatious War-god loves the brave . . .
- 394(a) Delightful, melodious swallow of spring.
- 394(b) Alexis the Bald is a-wooing again.
- 395 My temples are grey,
my hair is white,
youth's beauty past;
my teeth rot away;
life's sweet delight
not long now can last.
- So I often lament,
afraid of Hell:
it's a dreadful tip,

with a grim descent,
as you know full well
it's a one-way trip.

396 Bring water, bring wine, boy, bring us wreaths of flowers: I'm going to spar with Love.

397 And woven
garlands of lotus they hung about their chests.

398 Love's game of fivestones means frenzy and uproar on earth.

399 Takes off her tunic like a Dorian lass.

400 Once more I took refuge from Love with Pythomandrus.

401 Putting arm once more through the Carian-made shield-grip.

402(a) I long to share my youth with you:
you've such an attractive character.

402(b) Love approves of fairness.

402(c) For the lads should like me well for the things I have to say, as I sing attractive songs and can speak attractive words.

403 I'm borne over unmarked reefs.

404 Youth and health.

406 And from it took out a great treasure

407 So give me your slender thighs, dear boy, as a toast!

408 . . . her gently, like a tender unweaned fawn that's left alone in the forest by its antlered mother, trembling with fright.

409 And in a clean goblet let it be poured, three parts to five.

410 Let's wreath our brows with celery and celebrate the festival for Dionysus.

411(a) I wish I could die. No other way out of these troubles can ever be found.

- 411(b) Dionysus' loose-hipped Bassarids.
412 And won't you let me go home, now I'm drunk?
413 Once again Love has struck me with his mighty axe
like a smith, and doused me in the icy mountain stream.
414 And you've shorn off your soft hair's perfect bloom.
415 slinging the Sicilian kottabos.* 416 But I hate anyone with surly, difficult manners. I have come to know that you, Megistes, are one of the quiet sort.
417 Thracian filly, why so sharply shy away with sidelong glances, thinking I've no expertise?
Be assured, I'd put your bit on smartly, hold the reins and run you round the limits of the course.
But for now you graze the meadows, frisk and play, for want of any good experienced riding man.
418 Hear an old man's prayer,
maid with the nice hair and the golden dress.
419 Aristoclides, you're the first I mourn of my brave
friends:
you lost your young life to defend your land from slavery.
420 When I get white hairs mixed among the dark.
421 and my mind is stunned.
422 (Smerdies,) tossing his Thracian mane.
423+S 313
And lay to rest, O Zeus, that foreign sound, in case you(?) talk barbarian-style.
424 and the chamber wherein he was not so much the bridegroom as the bride.

425 You seem like gentle visitors, who want only a roof and a fire.

427 (To a woman)

And don't keep making burbling sounds like a sea-wave as you slurp down the equalizer-cup beside the canny Gastrodora.

428 Once more I'm in love and not in love, once more insane and not insane.

429+SLG p. 157

Whoever wants to fight,
he's welcome, let him fight.
But as for me, give here, boy,
the sweet wine for a toast.

430 You're overdoing it.

431 He doesn't bar the doors and sleep in peace.

432 (A woman speaks)

I'm starting to be wrinkled, over-ripe,
as a result of your lust.

433 While I held a full cup for Erxion
the whitecrest, and was working through the same.

434 And as for wreaths, each man wore three,
two rose, the other Naucratis.

435 The tables covered with good things of every sort.

436 And stick one's hand in the frying-pan.

437 I run away from her, scared as a cuckoo.

439 winding thighs round thighs.

440 ever to see too much; for lots are interested in you.

441(a) and chopped right through the neck.

441(b) and her shift was torn in two.

443 trembles with dark-leaved bay and olive green.

444 Virginal Love
agleam with longing.

P. Oxy. 3722 fr. 17 ii 7

Hey! What manner is this?

el. 2 I like him not, who when he drinks by the full bowl

tells only of disputes and tearful war, but rather him who blends the Muses' boon with Love's,
and turns his mind to good cheer and delight.

el. 3 What care I, dear friend,
for the bent-bowed Cimmerians, or the Scythians?

el. 4 I have become a drinker.

LASUS

702 I sing of Demeter and Clymenus' consort, the Maid,*
rousing a honey-cry hymn
in the low-booming Aeolian mode.

ASIUS

- 14    There came an aged, crippled, tramp-like branded slave,
         a parasite, to Meles' wedding feast,
all uninvited, wanting broth; while in the midst
         the hero stood, arisen from the mire.

DEMODOCUS

The Milesians
aren't fools—it's just that they do foolish things.
Another from Demodocus:
your Leria is a knavish man—not some, but all (save Procleës; and even he's a Leria).
If you meet Teians, insist on Prienian justice.

PYTHERMUS

910    Nothing else matters, it seems, apart from gold.

ANANIUS

1 Apollo, who art in Delos, or Pytho, perhaps,
or Naxos, or Miletus, or in holy Claros, come to the festival—or do you want to travel all the way to Scythia?

2-3 Of gold, Pythermus states that nothing else compares.

. . . . .

If someone locked a lot of gold up in a house with two or three people, and a small amount of figs,
he'd soon find out how much more figs are worth than gold.

4 And I love you far the best of all men, as the cabbage is my witness.

5 In springtime perch is best, in winter maigre;
of fancy dishes, prawns served on a fig-leaf.
A kid's nice meat in autumn; pork is right at the grape-treading. That's also the time for dogfish, sea-hare, and your thresher shark.
In summer, with the crickets yattering,
eat lamb; and as for sea-food thenabouts,
a tunny's no bad snack, indeed it stands out among all fish in a savoury sauce.
And fatted veal, I reckon, 's nice by night or day.

HIPPONAX

- 1 O Clazomenians, Bupalus has killed . . .
- 2-2a She was clad in a Coraxian shift, [but bare] as far as the Sindian Gap.
- 3 He called on Maia's son, Cyllene's sultan.*
- 3a 'Hermes, watchdog-choker—"Candaules", to put it in Lydian—
comrade of thieves, come and help me pull this rope.'
- 4-4a Cicon the son of Pandales, the ill-starred mullah with his bay wreath . . . this Amythaonid*
with nothing propitious to foretell.
- 5 To cleanse the town and be pelted with fig-branches.*
- 6 . . . in winter, pelting him and whipping him
with fig-branches and squills, just like a scapegoat.
- 7 He must be adopted as our scapegoat.
- 8 and place within his reach figs, barley-cake, and cheese, like scapegoats eat.
- 9 They've long been waiting for them,
open-mouthed,
armed with fig-branches like they have for scapegoats.
- 10 . . . till he's starved dry; let him be led a scapegoat
and given seven lashes on the willy.
- 12 With these words gulling the good folk of Erythrae,
the mother-fucker Bupalus with Ārētē, preparing to withdraw the unspeakable skin (?)
. . .
- 13 They were drinking from a pail—she had no cup,
the slave had fallen on to it and smashed it.

14                      And from the pail they drank;
now he, and now Ārētē drank a toast.

15           Why have you made your home with the wretch Bupalus?

And I at dusk

16            went to Ārētē under a lucky heron and booked in for the night.

17 For Ārētē,
as she bent over for me towards the lamp . . .

19      What birthcord-snipper wiped and cleaned you up, you blighted creature, as you squirmed and mewled?

20      Thinking to whack the first bloke with his stick.

21      He asks half a dollar for pecking at his cock.

22 Knocking her nose out, and the wick as well.

23      Upon these men shall fall a chilling ague.

25 'Artemis damn you!' 'And Apollo damn you!'

26-26a For one of them, steadily dining on tunny and gentleman's relish every day,
just like some eunuch kept at Lampsacus, ate up the allotment; so I have to dig the rocky hillside, munching modestly on a few figs and barley cobs—slaves' feed—not champing hare and francolin, not I,
not tarding pancakes up with sesame,
or dipping waffles into honeycombs.

27 And if they catch the wogs, they sell them off, the Phrygians to Miletus to grind corn . . .

28      Shoulder-deep-slackjaw Mimnes, another time don't paint a snake along a trireme's hull that's running back from prow to tillerman.
That'll be ruinous, you berk, you nerd,
and a bad omen for the tillerman,
if a snake comes and bites him on the shin!

29a His belly burbling like a pan of soup.

- 30 I think it's wrong that Critias the Chian was seized as an adulterer down there in the women's chapel.
- 32+34 Hermes, dear Hermes, Maia's son, Cyllenian, hear thou my prayer, for I am bloody frozen,
my teeth are chattering . . .
Grant Hipponax a cloak and a nice tunic
and some nice sandals and nice fur boots, and sixty gold sovereigns to balance me up . . .
For thou hast never granted me a cloak thick in the winter to cure me of the shivers, nor hast thou wrapped my feet in thick fur boots to stop my chilblains bursting.
- 35 I'll say, 'Cyllenian Hermes, Maia's son . . .' 36 And Wealth—he's all too blind—he's never come to my house, never said, 'Hipponax, here's three thousand silver drachmas, and a heap of other stuff besides.' No, he's a dimwit.
- 37 . . . said they should pelt and stone Hipponax.
38 Zeus, father Zeus, Olympian gods' sultan, wherefore hast thou not given me gold, silver?
- 39 I'll see my suffering soul go to damnation
if you don't send a peck of barley soonest so I can use the groats to make myself a posset I can take for my wretched state. .
- 40 O Malis, bless me: grant, I pray, that having a numbskull master, I don't get a beating.
- 41 And now he threatens to make me a worthless fellow
- 42 . . . the Smyrna road, straight on through Lydia, past the tomb of Attales and Gyges' gravestone and Sesostri's column and Tos' memorial, sultan at Mytalis, turning your paunch towards the setting sun.
- 44 And if you like, I'll let you have him cheap.
- 47 With him await the dawn of white-robed day;
then you'll salaam Phlyesian Hermes, then . . .

- 48 The dark fig, sister of the vine.
50 He/she lived behind the town in the Smyrna district,
between Roughside and Scabby Edge.
51 Then, smearing along his keel with caulking wax . . .
52 But you're holding your cloak wrapped round:
selling a plover?
53 But straightway yattering at one another . . .
54 A screech-owl, page and herald of the dead.
56 Piercing the jar-lid with a thin pipette. .
57 Dripping, like a strainer dripping dead wine.
58 And sweet rose-unguent, and a pan of wheat.
59 He sits and warms his blisters by the embers incessantly.
60 I wore a wreath of plums and mint.
61 . . . croaked like a jay in the jakes.
62 . . . naked on a bed of straw.
63 And Myson,* whom Apollo declared to be the sensiblest man alive.
65 . . . eagerly off the stern-tip into the sea.
66 and doesn't bite afterwards, like a tricky dog.
67 People who've drunk neat wine don't care a damn.
68 Two days in a woman's life give greatest pleasure:
those of her wedding and her funeral.
70 . . . (she) grunting . . .
this godforsaken wretch, who used to poke
his sleeping mother's sea-anemone . . .
[May the gods strike him] blind . . . and crippled.
72 Beside his chariot and white Thracian foals
. . . hard by the walls of Ilios Rhesus* was despoiled, the Aeneans' sultan.
73 And he pissed blood and shat a stream of gall,
while I . . .

All the teeth in my jaws have been dislodged;
I go about . . . I fear . . .

78 . . . he used bad language and . . .
 . . . warm ashes . . .
 but went not in where there was flame or fire.
 Throughout the month of . . . he would go, [chewing] dung-beetles, to the Cabiri's shrine and [make an offering of] a sprat or two.
 Then, going home, he dined on mulberries, and with the juice he dyed this fellow* red around the nose, spat on it thrice, and . . .
 shagged off at last . . .

79 . . . this foolishness . . . hitting his jaw
 . . . made them out of (into?) wax . . .
 . . . and splatter-shat upon . . .
 . . . with gold-gleaming wand . . . near the bedpost.
 Hermes, escorting him to Hipponax's
 [smuggled] the sneak-thief past the wretched dog [that] hisses like a viper [when friends come.]
 . . . Hipponax, taking thought at night
 . . . and devised . . .
 . . . he pondered. To the Appeaser [the mulla]h [sacrificed] . . . a fly . . .
 Then with three witnesses he went at once to where the bastard has his vino-shop,
 and found a fellow sweeping out the place,
 using a clump of thorn for lack of a broom.

84 On the floor . . . undressing . . .
 we bit and kissed . . .
 keeping a look-out through the doors . . .
 in case . . . should catch us naked . . .
 She was eagerly . . .
 while I was fucking . . .
 pulling out to the tip, like skinning a sausage, saying to hell with Bupalus . . .
 Straightway she [pushed] me out, and I [brimmed over.]

Now after our exertions we had [rest,]

I . . . like a wrinkled sail . . .

92 She spoke in Lydian:* 'Faskat ikrol'l'—

in Arsish, 'Up the arse . . .', and [pulling down] my ball by the bal[d patch]

she thrashed me with a fig-branch, like [a scapegoat]

fast[ened in] the stocks. And there [I was] under two torments: on one side the branch

[was killing] me, descending from above,

[my arse on the other] spattering me with shit.

The passage stank; and dung-beetles came buzzing

after the smell, over fifty of them:

some attacked, while others [whet] their te[eth],

and others fell upon the Arsenal doors . . .

104 . . . bending back his fingers . . .

. . . as he squirmed about

. . . I jumped on his belly

. . . lest he should think to curse me

. . . gnashed my teeth and bashed

. . . with legs apart

. . . I took off my cloak

. . . rubbing the dust off my feet

. . . I barred the door

. . . covering up the fire

. . . and lined my nostrils

with perfume . . . as used by Croesus.

. . . . .

. . . to trip his feet.

Slipping, he implored the seven-leaved cabbage

he used to offer potted to Pandora

at the Thargelia,* before the scapegoat.

. . . his forehead and his sides.

114a May someone pluck his arsehole, soften up . . .

114c An interprandial pooper.

115 drifting about on the wave.

At Salmydessos* may topknotted Thracian braves

welcome him naked ashore,

and may he there endure a multitude of woes,
eating the bread of a slave.

I hope they find him frozen stiff, and from the brine

covered in seaweed and slime, his teeth a-chatter, like a dog from lack of strength lying with face in the sand right by the water-line, under the breaking waves.

That's what I'd like to see done to my betrayer who has trampled on his oaths,
who was my friend in the past.

117 the cloak . . .

creel . . . you like to sit nearby. Hipponax here's aware of this better than anyone else, and Ariphantus knows. I envy those that have never yet seen you around, you dirty stinking thief. Well, you can quarrel with potter Aeschylides now:
he's been and carried off your household goods,
and laid
all your dishonesty bare.

118 O Sannus, as you wear a godless nose and can't control your appetite and have a ravening beak just like a heron's lend me your ear . . .

I want to give you some advice.

Your arms are wasted, and your neck;
and yet you eat up. Careful you don't get the gripes . . .

First strip and do your movements; Cicon will pipe you the tune of Codalus.

118a And all his household property's unharmed.

119 If only I could get a girl both beautiful and slender.

120-1 Take my mantle, lads, and let me punch old Bupalus in the eye.

I've got two right hands, you know; I hit the target
when I punch.

122 Once more I'll have to sue the bastard Metrotimus.
123 and get it better judged than Bias of Priene.
124 and not suck on a Lebedos dried fig from Kamandolos.

125 . . . eating bread of Cyprian Amathous wheat.

127 . . . and the daughter of Zeus, Cybebe, and Thracian Bendis.

128 Tell me, O Muse,* of Eurymedontiades the Charybdis,
him of the gastric carvers, who eats in irregular fashion:
tell how amid the shingle the wretch will wretchedly perish
by the vote of the people beside the limitless seashore.

129 How did he come to Bendova's isle?*

129a Why do you feed me on gamblers?

155 drank it up like a lizard in an alley.

177 Blest Hermes, who both knowest how to wake the sleeper
and how to put to sleep the wakeful . . .

ANONYMOUS THEOGNIDEA

- 1-4      Lord, son of Leto, child of Zeus, I never will forget thee at my outset or my close.
          No, I will sing thee first and last and in between,
          always; so hearken, grant me all success.
- 5-10     Lord Phoebus, when the lady Leto gave you birth, gripping the palm-tree with her slender arms,
          you loveliest of the immortals, by the circle-lake, fair Delos was pervaded end to end by an ambrosial fragrance, and the vast earth smiled,
          and the deep salty white-flecked main rejoiced.
- 15-18    Muses and Graces, Zeus's daughters who came once
          to Cadmus' wedding and sang this fair song:
          'We love what's beautiful, we love not what is not.'
          This was the word from your immortal lips.
- 73-4     Don't even let your friends in on your plans, not
          all:
          only a fraction are reliable.
- 83-6     Search the whole world, and you'll not find so many men
          that you can't get them in a single ship who show discretion in their speech and in their face
          and are not drawn by greed to wickedness.

87-90+1083-4

Don't speak nice words to me and keep your heart elsewhere
if I'm your friend and you're an honest man.
Either be friendly with sincerity, or spurn me openly and be an enemy.
That's how a decent man should be towards a
friend,
his attitude consistent to the end.

93-4

Whoever compliments you while you're face to face
but, once apart, gives tongue maliciously,

95-6

That sort of comrade is by no means to commend who speaks smooth-tongued while minded otherwise.

97-100

No, may I have the sort of friend who knows his friend
and, even when he's difficult, accepts him like a brother. Now take this to heart, my lad, and some day you will call me back to mind.

113-14

Don't ever take a rascal for your bosom friend:
steer clear of him—a bad port in a storm.

155-8

Soul-grinding poverty, accursed indigence—never hold these against a man in pique.
Zeus tilts the balance now to this side, now to that:
now to be rich, now to be penniless.

161-4

Many are weak of wit but favoured of the gods;
their prospects that were dismal turn out fair;
and there are those who plan things wisely, but who lack heaven's favour, and they toil with no success.

165-6

No man is prosperous, no man is poor, no man is low or high, but for the will of heaven.

167-8

We all have different troubles: no man that the sun looks down upon is truly fortunate.

169-70

Whom the gods bless, even the captious must applaud,
whereas a man's own effort counts for nought.

- 171-2 Pray to the gods. Theirs is the power. Without the gods
neither good fortune comes to men nor bad.
- 193-6 He knows she's of ignoble stock, and yet he takes her as his bride, led by the call of wealth.
Good name and bad name marry; force of circumstance,
which gives a man new standards, grips him hard.
- 197-208 Such wealth as comes from God by way of righteousness
and free from stain, abides for evermore;
but if a man acquires it wrongly, out of greed, or by a false oath takes what is not his,
at first he thinks he's made a gain, but in the end
it turns out ill; the gods' design prevails.
Men get misled, you see, because the Blessed ones
don't punish sin upon the very act:
one man may pay his woeful due himself, and not leave doom suspended over his dear sons;
another justice never overtakes, for death
too soon, uncaring, settles o'er his eyes.
- 213-14 My heart, display your facets to reflect your friends, and blend a temper to accord with each.
- 215-18 Adopt the cunning of the octopus, who takes the aspect of the rock he loiters at.
Now tag along with this line, now again change
hue:
cleverness beats consistency for sure.
- 221-6 The man who fancies that his neighbour is a fool
while he alone is crafty and adroit, he's unintelligent, his good sense is impaired.
For all of us alike have crafty thoughts,
but one man doesn't care to chase dishonest gains,
another favours treachery and tricks.
- 255-6 The finest thing is what's most right; the best is health;
the nicest is to get the thing one craves.

- 257-60 I'm a fine horse, a winner, but a scoundrel's now my jockey—this it is that pains me most.
Many a time I've thought of breaking off the bit, throwing my worthless rider, running free.
- 261-2 No wine for me: beside my slender girl a man not half my worth is having all the fun.
- 263-6 Her mum and dad must like their wine well cooled: she comes
so often to the well, and draws, and cries—the well by which I took her round the waist, and kissed
her on the neck, while prettily she squealed.
- 267-70 You all know Poverty, pariah though she be;
she visits not the courts or market-place,
for everywhere she's elbowed, everywhere abhorred,
and hated everywhere she shows her face.
- 271-8 All other things the gods have given mortal men in equal shares—accursed age, and youth—but what is worst of all in human life—not death nor any sickness is so hard to bear—is when you raise your sons and give them all they need,
providing for them with much sacrifice,
and then they hate their father, praying for his
death,
and shun him like some beggar at the door.
- 279-82 A knave will likely have a knave's morality, not caring what resentment he provokes.
A scoundrel has so many opportunities for easy crime, and thinks he's got it made.
- 283-6 Trust no one in this town in any step you take,
whatever pledge of friendship he has sworn—not even if he seeks to make the mighty king of the immortals, Zeus, his guarantor.
- 287-92 In such a town of grumblers nothing's ever right.
Well, there are always many out of luck;

but now the gentry's troubles fill the lower class with glee, and they exult in uncouth ways.
All inhibition's gone, and brazen lawlessness,
defeating justice, holds the land in sway.

293-4 Not even the lion always feasts on meat. For all his strength, he's sometimes caught in helpless plight.

295-8 It's a hard burden for a chatterbox to hold his tongue; but when he talks, he is a bore.
Nobody likes him, and it's not from choice one goes
to join that sort of man's symposium.

301-2 Be nasty and be nice, be gracious and be gruff to slaves and servants and the folk next door.

303-4 Don't meddle with the good life, leave it undisturbed,
but change the bad one till you've set it straight.

305-8 Not every villain is a villain from the womb:
it's only after making friends with knaves
they learn bad ways and ugly talk and lawlessness, believing everything their comrades say.

309-12 In company a man should keep his counsel, seem to notice nothing, almost not be there, just joke and banter. Then, when he goes out, he knows
what each man's like, and this can be his strength.

313-14 When it's a rave-up, then I damn well rave; but when
it's serious, I'm the seriousest of all.

332<sup>ab</sup> An exile has no friend he can depend upon.
That's the most painful thing about his plight.

341-50 Olympian Zeus, fulfil my prayer, the time is ripe:
against my ills now grant me something good, or let me die, if I find no relief from these sore troubles. Let me repay hurt with hurt:

it's only fair. Yet I see no revenge in sight on those who've robbed me of my house and home
 and made me play the dog that crossed the icy stream
 in winter flood and shook it all straight off.
 I'd like to drink their blood! May my good fairy come
 and do all this exactly to my taste.

351-4 O wretched Poverty, why won't you up and seek another man? Don't cling, I love you not, so go away, call at another house. Don't stay to share this miserable life with me.

363-4 Flatter your foe well. When he's eating from your hand,
 then get your own back. No need to explain.

365-6 Keep your thoughts back, and let your tongue be ever smooth.
 Quick temper is a mark of low-class men.

373-400 Dear Zeus, I'm quite surprised at you. You're king of all,
 the power and the glory's yours alone;
 you understand the heart and mind of every man,
 and yours, lord, is the highest majesty.
 So how, Zeus, can you bring yourself to treat alike wrongdoers and the law-abiding man, whether we are disposed to sensible restraint or give way to unrighteousness and crime?
 Are there no guidelines set by heaven for mortal
 men,
 no path to follow that will please the gods?

. . . . .

[Some people rob and steal quite shamelessly,
 but still succeed and prosper: others, who refrain from wicked acts, preferring what is right, get only poverty, whose child is helplessness, who blights men's wits by force of circumstance and leads their hearts astray to do some wrong. A man

puts up perforce with much indignity, beaten by indigence, from which he learns bad ways

despite himself: deceit and trickery and quarrelling. No other ill compares with this,
for it produces utter helplessness.

In poverty, when want takes hold, it's soon made clear

who is a rogue and who's a decent sort.
The one has honest thoughts, the man within whose breast

the attitudes are planted always straight, whereas the other shows no sense, come good or ill,

while the good man is forced to deal with both,
treat friends with due respect, shun ruinous perjury

. . . . .
. . . . .

with care, avoiding the immortals' wrath.

401-6

Don't strive too hard. Due measure's best for everything

in human life. Often a man strives hard for status, seeking gain—a man whom God intends to lead astray into great wrongfulness, and easily makes bad appear to him as good,
and worthwhile things appear to him as bad.

407-8

You were my best friend, but you've fallen short.
No fault

of mine: it's your own attitude that's wrong.

413-14

I'll not become so fortified, or let the wine
so bring me on, that I speak ill of you.

415-18

I search, but can discover no one like myself
to be my true friend, pure of all deceit.
Apply the touchstone, rub me down like gold with lead:
surface and inside tell a single tale.

- 419-20 There's much I understand but let pass by,
perforce
silent, aware how little we can do.
- 421-4 Many men have no shutters on their mouths that fit
correctly, and there's much they're careless of.
Often there's bad inside that's best left stored
away;
it's better something good comes out than bad.
- 425-8 Best thing of all for men is simply not be born and never look upon the keen sun's light; but when you're born, best pass as soon as possible
death's door, and lie with earth heaped thick above.
- 439-40 He's foolish, who keeps watch on my propensities and meanwhile takes no steps to guard his own.
- 441-6 For no one's wholly fortunate. The man of worth puts up with ill, but doesn't let it show;
the no-good lacks the art of standing firm, come good
or ill, with spirit. The immortals' gifts come to us in all shapes and sorts. We must endure
and take whatever the immortals send.
- 447-52 Or wash me down: the water will run steadily quite clean and unpolluted off my head.
In everything you'll find me like refiner's gold,
still showing yellow where the touchstone rubs.
Upon its surface no dark tarnishing or rust takes hold; it keeps its brightness ever pure.
- 453-6 If you'd as much brains, mate, as you've stupidity,
if you'd as much sense as you've senselessness, you'd be looked up to by as many in this town
as now consider you a useless prat.
- 457-60 A young wife does not suit a husband who is old:
the boat will not obey the steering-oar;

she slips her anchor, breaks her mooring-ropes,
and oft

she finds another harbour for the night.

461-2 Don't fix your heart and mind on unattainable designs: it never gets you anywhere.

463-4 The gods give nothing easy, neither good nor bad.
It's hard endeavours that they most exalt.

465-6 Work for high standards, be a friend of righteousness,
and don't give way to ignoble avarice.

497-8 The witless and the sound of wit alike turn empty-headed when they drink too deep.

499-502 Of gold and silver, experts make assay by fire, but wine is what shows up the heart of man,
even a clever fellow, when he drinks too deep,
bringing his wisdom into disrepute.

503-8 I'm heavy-headed with wine, Onomacritus, not any longer
in control of my mind; drink has me on the retreat.

Here is the room going round and round. I'd better try standing,
find out whether the wine's also got hold of my legs
and of my innermost wits. I'm afraid I'll do something silly
in my fortified state, badly disgracing myself.

509-10 Wine drunk too copious is a bane, but if it's drunk with prudence, then no bane, but sheerest boon.

511-22 You've come then, Clearistus, crossed the deep blue sea.

You're broke, old mate, I know; and so am I;
but I'll bring out the best of what I've got, and if a friend of yours turns up, couch how you like.
I won't hide anything that's in the house, nor fetch in extra stocks for entertaining you.
As for provisioning your ship, I will provide as best I can and as the gods allow;

- and if they ask about my way of life, reply
    'Poor, by good standards, but by poor ones,
    good:
if one old house-friend visits, he won't let him down,
    but entertaining more's beyond his means.'
- 523-6 It's not for nothing, Wealth, that men esteem you
    most,
    for you make light of dismal circumstance.
Besides, to have wealth is the proper mark of class,
    while poverty's the burden of the prole.
- 527-8 I sing alas for youth, alas for curst old age—
    the approach of one, the passing of the other.
- 529-30 Nor have I friend or trusty comrade e'er betrayed, and in my soul there's nothing of the slave.
- 531-4 My heart within me's always gladdened when I hear
    the reed-pipes sounding out with lovely voice.
I'm happy drinking well and singing to the pipes,
    I'm happy fingering the clear-toned lyre.
- 535-8 The slave can never hold his head up straight:
    it's always crooked, and his neck is bent.
For rose and hyacinth grow not from squills,
    nor from slave mother child with spirit free.
- 547-8 Pressure no man with roughness, let fair dealing serve:
    there's nothing stronger than a kindly act.
- 555-60 A man laid low in grievous troubles must endure and ask the immortal gods for his release.
Take heed: your fortune's balanced on a razor's edge:
    sometimes you will have plenty, sometimes less,
    which means you'll never get to be a millionaire,
    but never sink too deep in poverty.
- 561-2 I pray to have some for myself, and give my friends
    the surplus—from my enemies' estates.

- 563-6 Get asked to dine, and seat yourself beside a man of worth, who's mastered every kind of skill.
When he says something clever, note it, so you learn
and have this bit of profit to take home.
- 567-70 I sport and make the most of youth; for when I die
it's long enough I'll lie there like a stone, reduced to silence, lovely sunshine left behind,
blind evermore, fine fellow that I am.
- 571-2 Vain fantasy's no good, experience is the thing.
Many imagine joys they've never known.
- 573-4 Do good, receive good: why send other courier?
Doing a good turn speeds your message straight.
- 575-6 My friends betray me—for I steer clear of my foe
as helmsmen steer clear of the hidden reef.
- 577-8 'It's easier to make good bad than make bad good.'
—Don't try to teach me. I'm too old to learn.
- 579-82 I loathe a knave, I draw my veil and pass him by,
a creature with a small bird's empty brains;
and I loathe a roving woman, or a reckless man who wants to plough another fellow's field.
- 583-4 But what's already happened cannot be undone. What's yet to come is what to watch.
- 591-4 One must endure whate'er the gods give mortal
men,
and yet not make too much of either lot:
in bad times not too heartsick, nor when things look up
straightway exulting, till the outcome's clear.
- 595-8 Let's go on being friends, mate, at a distance though.
One can have too much of anything, bar wealth.
Yes, let's be friends, long-term, but stick with other blokes
who better understand what makes you tick.
- 599-602 I saw you—straying down the same old common road
you used to, cheating on my love for you.

- To hell with you, whom gods detest and men can't trust,
whose bosom held a cold and cunning asp.
- 603-4 Magnesia was destroyed by lawlessness like this that now pervades this holy town of ours.
- 605-6 Surplus has ruined far more men than deficit—
all those that wanted more than was their due.
- 607-10 There's small joy when a lie's first told, and in the end
the gain it brings is foul, contemptible.
There's nothing fine or fair about it, once a lie attends a man and issues from his lips.
- 611-14 To find fault isn't hard, no more than praising is;
it's paltry men that turn their minds to it.
Paltry men, paltry chatter; they won't hold their tongues;
but gentlemen know where to draw the line.
- 615-16 There's not a single good and reasonable man of all the sun today looks down upon.
- 617-18 By no means everything turns out as men desire:
the immortals' power surpasses ours by far.
- 619-22 All sick at heart I toss and turn in helplessness;
I haven't cleared poverty's rocky point.
They all respect a rich man, and despise the poor;
in everyone the attitude's the same.
- 623-4 There's every kind of ill in men, and every kind of excellence, and ways of making do.
- 625-6 It's hard for a man of sense to talk at length with fools,
and hard for him always to hold his tongue.
- 627-8 It's bad form to be drunk in sober company,
or to stay sober when the rest are drunk.
- 629-30 The prime of youth and vigour goes with empty brains;
it oft emboldens men to go astray.
- 633-4 Think over twice or thrice what comes into your head.
An over-hasty man's disaster-prone.

- 635-6 Good judgement and discretion cling to men of worth;
but these are now a real minority.
- 637-8 Danger and hope are two of a kind in human life:
unmanageable forces, both of them.
- 639-40 It's often so, that men's designs run well, past hope and promise, yet are crowned with no success.
- 641-4 You'll never know who is your friend or who your
foe
until you find yourself in serious straits.
Plenty are pals and comrades when the drinking's
on,
but not so many when the going's tough.
- 645-6 You'll not find many patrons to be trusty friends
when you're in helpless plight, cast down at heart.
- 647-8 Now inhibition is extinct in human life,
and brazenness is rampant everywhere.
- 649-52 Vile Poverty, why must my shoulders bear your weight
that so deforms my body and my soul?
You teach me many an ugly trick despite myself and all I know of good society.
- 657-66 Be not too vexed by hardships, nor when fortune's fair
too joyful. Men of worth should take what comes.
Don't ever swear that such and such will never be:
the gods resent it, and the outcome's theirs.
They act, what's more: bad fortune is transformed to
good
and good to bad; a man in penury grows quickly rich, or one who has abundant wealth loses it all within a single night;
a wise man goes astray, a fool's imaginings come true; even the no-good wins respect.
- 683-6 Many are rich but stupid; others strive for good but are oppressed by arduous poverty.
And both these sorts are helpless to achieve their aims,
the second barred by means, the first by wit.

687-8 It is not granted unto men to fight the gods, or to pass judgement: no one has this right.

689-90 One ought to cause no harm, except when harm were due,
nor do such deeds as are not better done.

691-2 Bon voyage, Chaeron, o'er the mighty sea, and may Poseidon bring you safe to cheer your friends.*

693-4 Surplus has been the ruin of many a foolish man:
when you're well off, it's hard to draw the line.

695-6 My heart, I cannot give you everything to suit:
you're not the only one to crave what's nice.

697-718

When I fare well, I've friends enough; but if some ill befalls me, few can be relied upon.

To most men's way of thinking, only one thing counts:

that's wealth, and nothing else is any use,
not even if you've Rhadamanthys' prudent head,
or brains to beat the Aeolid Sisyphus,* who by his wits returned even from Hades' house with sly persuasion of Persephone, who brings oblivion and impairs men's consciousness.

That no one else has ever yet contrived, once death's dark cloud's enfolded him and he has gone

into the shadowed country of the dead and passed the gates of blackness that shut in the souls

of the deceased, for all that they protest.
Even from there the hero Sisyphus returned up to the sunlight by his cleverness.

Nor does it help if you can tell convincing lies and speak with godlike Nestor's nimble tongue, or run more swiftly than the speeding Harpies* go and the fleet-footed sons of Boreas.

No, everyone must just agree on this, that wealth with all men has the greatest influence.

- 729-30 Man was assigned to Cares, whose wings are many-hued;
they cry for thought of life and livelihood.
- 731-52 O father Zeus, I wish the gods could so agree that sinners could choose lawlessness, and set their hearts on misdemeanour, but that anyone who did so, heedless of the gods' regard, should pay the price in person, and the father's sins should not remain to persecute his sons;
and that a bad man's sons who fear your anger, Zeus, holding themselves to righteous thoughts and deeds,
and in their dealings always cleave to righteousness,
should never pay for fathers' trespasses.
That's what I wish the gods approved. But as things are,
the rogue escapes, another takes the rap.
Again, how is it fair, lord of the deathless gods,
that someone who keeps out of wrongfulness,
guilty of no transgression and no perjury,
a righteous man, suffers unrighteously?
Who else thereafter, when he looks on this man's fate,
will fear the gods, and in what frame of mind,
when an unrighteous criminal who takes no care to avoid the wrath of any man or god commits his crimes and rolls in riches, while the good
are sore oppressed by arduous poverty?
- 753-6 Take this to heart, my friend, and make wealth honestly,
be sensible, keep clear of lawlessness.
Never forget these lines, and in the end you will be glad you've followed sensible advice.
- 757-64 May Zeus in heaven always keep his right hand held over this town, protecting it from harm;
also the other blest immortal gods; and may Apollo guide my tongue and mind aright.

Let lyre and pipes play on, voicing the holy song,
 while we with due libations to the gods keep drinking, making pleasant talk among ourselves,
 completely fearless of this Median war.*

765-8 Grant things may be like this, or better, while we pass
 our time with cheerful hearts and free from cares in pleasure. Keep away all bad contingencies, accurst old age, and death's finality.

769-72 The Muses' page and mouthpiece, should he know some choice
 invention, must not keep it to himself,
 but muse, in turn display, in turn compose again.
 How will it help him, if it isn't shared?

773-88 Lord Phoebus, you're the one that built the citadel on Pelops' son Alcathous' behalf.* now keep the Medes' rampaging army off the town,
 so that the people with a cheerful heart
 when spring arrives can make fine hecatomb-parades, enjoying happy feasting and the lyre
 and dances round your altar with glad paeon-cries.
 The fact is, I'm afraid when I behold the ruinous, stupid quarrels of the Greeks; so you look kindly, Phoebus, guard this town of ours.
 For me, I've travelled in my time to Sicily,
 and to Euboea's vine-producing plains,
 and handsome Sparta by Eurotas' reedy banks,
 and I was always kindly entertained;
 yet none of all those places gratified my heart—
 it's true, you know, there is no place like home.

789-94 I want no other interest but high-class life and intellectual culture. Keeping this I hope to stay enjoying lyre and dance and song,
 and with the best set keep the best in mind,
 doing no wrong or harm to any, citizen or alien, but living righteously.

797-8 Some carp at men of worth, others approve of them:
 the lower class aren't spoken of at all.

799-800

There's no one born on earth with whom no fault is found.

It's best with fewest people paying heed.

801-4

There never was nor ever will be born a man who pleases everyone throughout his life.

Not even Kronos' son, Zeus, king of gods and men, succeeds in satisfying everyone.

823-4

Don't feed a tyrant's power, led by hopes of gain; but don't swear by the gods to cause his death.

825-30

How can you bring yourselves to sing songs to the pipes?

You see the frontier from the market-place that bounds the land that feeds you as you feast away with crimson garlands on your golden hair.

Come, crop this hair short, Scythian, end the revelry, lament the loss of our fair-scented land.

831-2

By trusting I lost all, by mistrust kept it safe; but neither line is easy to sustain.

837-40

Wretched mankind's beset by two dire fates in drink: crippling thirst, and horrid drunkenness.

I'll steer midway between the two: you won't induce me not to drink, nor yet to drink too much.

841-2

Wine's mostly nice to me, save when it leads me on, all fortified, to face my enemy.

843-4

But when he that was higher comes to be below,* at that time drink no more and hie you home.

845-6

A man well placed is easy to displace again, but to make good what's badly placed is hard.

847-50

Trample this empty-witted people down, apply the sharp goad, lay on them the heavy yoke.

You'll find no people so in love with tyranny in any land the sun looks down upon.

851-2

May Zeus the Olympian smite the man who blandishes with soft words, seeking to deceive his friend.

- 853-4 I knew already, but I know much better now, that scoundrels are devoid of gratitude.
- 855-6 Often this city through its leaders' knavishness has run alongshore like a listing ship.
- 857-60 If one among my friends sees me in some distress, he turns his head and will not even look;
but if some good befalls me—rare thing for a man—
then everywhere it's hugs and fond regards.
- 861-4 (A woman speaks)
My near ones let me down, deny me anything when male guests come. Then of my own accord
I leave the hall at evening and return at dawn,
the hour when the cocks awake and crow.
- 865-8 To many a worthless man God grants prosperity that brings no profit either to his friends or him, whereas a real man's glory never dies:
a spearman's the salvation of his land.
- 869-72 May the broad brazen sky above crash down on me,
the fate men used to fear in ancient times,
if I don't stand by those who show themselves my
friends,
and vex and irritate my enemies.
- 873-6 I praise you, wine, on some points, and find fault with some;
I cannot give you total love or hate.
You're bane and blessing. Who could criticize you, who,
that has an ounce of expertise, approve?
- 877-8 Be young, my heart, have fun: soon other men will take
my place, and I'll be dark dust in my grave.
- 879-84 This wine I'm serving comes from Mount Taygetus.
My vineyard there was planted on the slopes below the summit by old Theotimos, whom the gods love; and he dug a cooling stream from Platanistous. Drink! It will disperse your cares; with this to line you, you'll be much refreshed.

- 885-6 May peace and plenty rule the town, so we can all make merry. I've no love of cruel war.
- 887-8 Don't strain your ears to catch the herald's bawled commands;
it's not our own land that we're fighting for.
- 889-90 But it is shaming, when you're on the spot and horsed,
to get no sighting of the tearful fray.
- 891-4 O shameful feebleness! Cerinthus is destroyed, Lelantum's good vine-plain they're ravaging;
the men of worth are exiled, rascals rule the town.
May Zeus wipe out the clan of Cypselus!*
- 901-2 One man is better, one is worse: each has his role, as no one man is skilled at everything.
- 903-30 He who takes care to spend according to his means is best regarded by discerning men.
For if one could descry the end of life, how far one had to go before one passed away, it would make sense for someone who had more time left
to spend less, so he kept enough to live.
But no, it can't be done. This causes me much grief, it stings me to the quick, I'm in two minds,
I'm standing at a junction, with two ways ahead,
and I'm deliberating which to choose:
to cut all spending and exist in misery,
or to have fun, achieving nothing much.
I've seen a man who wouldn't spend and never gave his belly decent food, though rich enough, but he went down to Hades sooner than he'd planned, and all his riches went to who knows who;
so that means misplaced pains, and choice of heir denied.
I've seen another who indulged himself, used up his wealth, said, 'I'll have fun before I go' —
and now he begs off any friend he sees.
So, Democles, the best of all plans is to match expenditure to means, and keep account.

Then no one else will share your earnings, if you die,
and you won't end a beggar and a slave.

However old you grow, your means won't all run out;

and when you're old, that's when you most need
means,

for if you're well off, then you've friends enough; if
not,

they're few; you're not the fine chap that you were.

931-2 It's wise to save, for nobody will even mourn your death unless he sees there's property.

933-8 Few men combine impressive looks with quality:
how fortunate is one who has them both!
By everyone he's honoured; all make way for him,
the young, the old, and those of his own age;
he grows old in celebrity, and no one thinks
to cheat him of his due respect and rights.

939-42 I cannot sing in pure tones like the nightingale:
I went out merrymaking last night too.
I will not blame the piper either. No, my friend (who's musical enough) has let me down.

943-4 I'll stand up here close by the piper, on his right, and sing, with prayers to the immortal gods.

945-6 I shall go by the rule, dead straight, and veering off to neither side. My judgement must be sound.

947-8 I will adorn my shining city; I'll not let the mob take over, or give way to rogues.

949-54 I had a deer's fawn, like a lion in my might,
caught in my claws, and did not drink its blood;
I scaled high city walls, and did not sack the town;
I yoked two steeds, and did not mount the car;
achieved, left unachieved; fulfilled, did not fulfil;
performed, performed not; did, and did not do.

955-6 Doing good turns to villains hits you two ways on:
you lose a pile, and get no gratitude.

957-8 If you've had some big boon from me and shown no thanks,

I hope you'll come in need another time.

- 959-62 So long as I was drinking from the spring's dark flow,
its water, as I thought, was sweet and good.
But now it's dirty, other waters running in:
I'll leave this sewer, find another spring.
- 963-70 Don't ever praise a man until you know for sure his temperament, his style, his turn of mind.
Many conceal a false and knavish character,
adopt a disposition for the day;
but Time brings their true natures to the light for sure.
Why, I myself was grievously misled, approving you too soon, before I got to know your many ways. Now I steer clear of you.
- 971-2 A drinker's party prize—what merit lies in that?
Often a no-good beats a man of worth.
- 973-8 No man whom once the earth has covered, who has gone
down to the dark, Persephone's abode,
has any pleasure listening to lyre or pipes,
or raising to his lips the wine-god's gift.
In view of which, I'll give my heart a good time, while
my legs are spry, my head undodderly.
- 979-82 Give me a man who's friend in deed, not just in word,
who'll make an effort, fight, draw on his funds,
not one whose talk beguiles me while the drinking's
on,
but one who'll act to show what good he is.
- 983-8 But now let us commit our hearts to festiveness, while the delights of pleasure still run on.
Our youth, our splendour passes by swift as a thought:
not even charging horses go so fast,
that bear their warrior master madly to the fray,
galloping blithe across the fertile plain.

- 989-90 Drink when they're drinking; if you're ever sick
at heart,
let no man notice that you feel oppressed.
- 991-2 Sometimes you'll be the victim hurt, sometimes the glad accomplisher. Man's power comes and goes.
- 993-1002
Just set us, Academus, to compete in song, and let there be a boy in choicest bloom
for prize, as you and I contest in artistry:
you'd soon see how the mule excels the ass.
The Sun in heaven would have brought his steeds
upon
the level stretch, the mid-part of the day;
we would be finishing our meal, just as we chose,
treating ourselves to every kind of dish,
and then a pretty Spartan girl with slender hands would clear the wash-jug, fetch the garlands in.
- 1007-12 Let me advise the world: so long as you possess youth's lovely bloom, and still are sound of mind, use what you have for pleasure. No return to youth is granted by the gods to mortal men, and no escape from death. Ugly, accursed age takes hold on top, and cuts through our pretence.
- 1013-16 O happy, lucky man, that finds his way below to Death's dark hall without torment and trial, not having had to cower from his foes, perforce transgress, or test the mettle of his friends.
- 1023-4 I'll never bow my neck beneath my foes' hard yoke, even with Tmolus* pressing on my head.
- 1029-36 Endure, my heart, even the unendurable:
it's only lesser men give way to pique.
Don't add to your indignity and hurt with boasts you can't make good, embarrassing your friends and making your enemies laugh. A mortal man cannot lightly evade the destiny God sends,

either by diving to the purple ocean's bed
or when he's caught in misty Tartarus.

1039-40 O foolish, witless mortals, they that do not fill the wine-cups when the Dog-star's season starts.

1041-2 Here with the piper! Where our enemy makes moan
we'll laugh and drink, exulting in his woes.

1043-4 Let's sleep, and leave the gods to guard the town, our lovely homeland rich in fertile soil.

1045-6 By God, however well wrapped up these fellows sleep,
they'll jump to let us merry-makers in!

1047-8 For now, let's talk of good things, drink, enjoy
ourselves:
what happens after is the gods' affair.

1049-54 Just like a father to a son I'll give you good advice; it's up to you to take it in.
Don't ever come to grief by rushing things. Reflect deeply beforehand, use your own good sense.
It's madmen that have thoughts that fly away with them;
reflection leads to sense and benefit.

1055-8 But let us talk no more of that. Play me the pipes, we'll take the Muses up, the two of us.
It's thanks to them we're so well gifted, you and I,
and so well known all round the villages.

1059-62 Often, Timagoras, it's hard, however skilled you are, to judge a character by looks.
Some keep their worthlessness disguised by affluence,
and some their worth by cursed poverty.

1063-8 In youth you're free to sleep the night beside a friend
and satisfy your craving for delight;
you're free to go carousing, singing to the pipes.
There are no pleasures to compare with these for men and women. Wealth, respect, what use are they?

Pleasure beats everything, and jollity.

1069-70 O foolish, witless mortals, weeping for the dead
but not the fading of the flower of youth.

1073-4 Now tag along with this line, now again change
hue:
cleverness even beats nobility.

1075-8 When something's still in train, it's very hard to tell
what outcome God intends to bring about;
it's veiled in darkness, and until the destined hour men cannot see beyond their helplessness.

1079-80 No foe of mine who's worthy will I vilify, nor compliment a friend when he's a knave.

1085-6 You're often hard to take, Demonax. It's because you've never learned to do things you dislike.

1087-90 Castor and Polydeuces, you that have your home in Sparta by Eurotas' flowing stream:
send ill on me that e'er I plot against a friend,
and on him twice the ill he plans for me.

1091-4 My heart has problems where your friendship is concerned:
I can't quite hate you, and I can't quite love.
I find that when a man's a friend, it's hard to hate,
but hard to love, when he is contrary.

1097-1100

Now I take wing and soar free, like a bird that breaks
the knavish trapper's noose and flies away from off the lake. You've lost my friendship, and in time
you'll recognize how sensible I was.

1105-6 When they apply the touchstone, rub you down with lead,
you'll prove pure gold, perfect to every eye.

1107-8 O misery! Now by my misfortune I have brought joy to my foes and trouble to my friends.

- 1115-16 You're rich; because I'm poor you taunt me; yet I have something, and with God's help I'll yet earn more.
- 1117-18 Wealth, handsomest and most alluring of the gods,
with you even a bum becomes a gent.
- 1119-22 Give me my span of youth; Apollo love me well, fair Leto's son, and Zeus the immortals' king, so I may live in goodness, out of all harm's way,
with youth and affluence to warm my heart.
- 1123-8 Ah, don't remind me. I've been through Odysseus' trials,
who came up from the mighty house of Death,
and then with satisfaction, merciless, he slew
the suitors of Penelope his bride, who long had stayed beside her son, awaiting him while he explored earth's fearsome fastnesses.
- 1129-32 I'll drink my fill, ignore soul-grinding poverty and hateful fellows that speak ill of me;
but I lament my lovely youth that's running out,
and weep at the approach of grim old age.
- 1135-50 Hope is the only good god now among mankind:
the rest have left us and gone off to heaven.
The mighty goddess Trust is gone, Restraint is
gone,
and Charity's departed from the earth.
No longer can you trust in men's judicial oaths,
and nobody respects the immortal gods;
the moral man's a vanished breed; morality and ancient law are recognized no more.
But while a man still lives and sees the sun still shine,
if he's religious, let him look to Hope.
Let him pray to the gods and burn his offerings honouring Hope in first place and in last.
But let him always guard against the crooked lies of bad men who, with no heed of the gods, direct their thoughts at other people's property
in foul conspiracy of wickedness.

- 1151-2 Never forsake the friend you have and seek another,
gulled by the arguments of good-for-noughts.
- 1153-4 I pray to live in wealth, away from vexing cares, doing no harm and suffering no ill.
- 1155-6 I crave no riches, pray not for them. May I live from modest means, just suffering no ill.
- 1157-60 Riches and cleverness are men's great conquerors:
riches can never glut your appetite;
and none, however clever, shuns more cleverness—
he craves it, and he cannot get enough.
- 1160ab Buy yourself someone new. This I don't have to do:
be grateful for the things I've done before.
- 1163-4 Keen-witted men have eyes and tongue and ears and thought
all rooted in the middle of their breast.
- 1165-6 Consort with men of worth, and never mix with
knaves,
until your trade's done and you're safely
home.
- 1167-8 Good men make good response, and match it by their deeds;
the weak word of the knave's gone with the wind.
- 1169-70 Bad company has bad effects, as you'll find out:
they're mighty gods that you have sinned against.
- 1181-2 When it's an autocrat, who chews the people up, bed him down how you like: the gods don't
mind.
- 1185-6 The brain's a good thing; so's the tongue; but they are found
in few men who can keep them both in check.
- 1187-90 No price you pay can buy escape from death, or
grim
misfortune, if its destined end's not nigh,

nor from distress of mind, when God sends pain
and woe:

a mortal man cannot get off through bribes.

- 1191-4 I crave not to be laid upon a kingly couch
in death: no, give me comfort while I live.
Thorns make as good a bed as satins for a corpse.
Hard or soft, it's all the same to him.

- 1195-6 Swear no false oath upon the immortals. There's no way
of hiding from the gods the debt you owe.

- 1203-6 I shan't go there, I shan't invite him here,
nor mourn the tyrant even at his grave,
no more than he would care if I were dead,
or let a warm tear trickle from his eye.

- 1207-8 You're not excluded, and we're not inviting you.
We like you here, we like you when you're not.

- 1209-10 A Dusky I was born, but by the walls of Thebes
I dwell, far sundered from my native land.

- 1211-16 Don't frivolously mock my parents, Argyris.
You have been taken into slavery;
I've much else to complain of, woman, being now an exile, but I'm not a wretched slave, and I'm not bought and sold. I too can boast a fine home town—it lies on the Lethaeon Plain.*

- 1229-30 For I'm called home now by a carcass of the sea*
that e'en in death speaks through a living mouth.

Love poems

- 1231-4 Cruel Eros, madness-spirits nursed you from your birth.

Because of you* was Ilios brought low,
and Aegeus' son, great Theseus, and Oileus' son,
the noble Ajax, through his foolishness.

- 1235-8 Lad, change your mind and hear me. It's no odious
or charmless thing I want to tell your heart;

- so bring yourself to take my message in: you're not compelled to do what isn't to your taste.
- 1239-40 They'll often tell me foolish tales concerning you,
and you concerning me; but pay no heed.
- 1241-2 You'll have fond memories of your past love; of the one
coming along you won't have such control.
- 1243-4 Yes, let's be friends, long-term; but stick with other chaps:
your tricky nature turns faith back to front.
- 1245-6 Water and fire will never mix, and you and I will never to each other be true friends.
- 1247-8 Think on your error and my hate, and be assured I'll punish your offence as best I can.
- 1249-52 Lad, like a horse that's had its fill of barleycorns you've found your way back to my stableyard.
You missed your skilful charioteer, the lovely mead,
the cool spring water, and the shady trees.
- 1255-6 Whoever does not love lads, horses, hounds, must have a heart that never knows good cheer.
- 1257-8 My lad, you're like the roaming perils that beset our life, and cleave to ever different men.
- 1259-62 My lad, you're good to look at, but upon your head
there sits an obdurate, unfeeling crown.
You have the disposition of a wheeling kite,
and let yourself be led by other men.
- 1263-6 My lad, you have repaid your benefactor ill,
and shown no gratitude for kindnesses.
You've never done me any good, but many times
I've treated you well, yet got no respect.
- 1267-70 Lads have a horse's outlook. When the charioteer lies in the dust, the horse makes no lament:
he serves the next man who will stuff him full of oats.
The same with lads, they love whoever's by.

- 1271-4   Lad, your reckless behaviour destroyed my sensible instincts,
           and our friends were ashamed, knowing about the affair.
       But for a little while you cooled my fever; my speeding
           voyage into the night briefly found haven from storm.
- 1275-8   Love too comes up in season, just when earth
           waxes and burgeons with the flowers of spring.
       Then from the beauteous isle of Cyprus Love goes forth among mankind to sow his seeds.
- 1279-82   I won't do ill by you, not even if that is my best bet vis-à-vis the gods, dear lad.
       They are no small offences that I'm saddled with,
           but lovely lads . . . wronging . . .
- 1283-94   Don't treat me wrongly: I still want to please you,
           lad.
       What I've discovered leaves me in good heart.
       You won't get by me with deceit and tricks, you
           see:
           you've overtaken me and got the lead,
       but yet I'll stab you from behind, as once, they say,
           the daughter of Iasius, Atalanta,*
- . . . . .
- For all her beauty she refused the love of men,
           girt herself up and ran—but all in vain.
       The gold-haired Atalanta left her father's house and disappeared into the mountain heights avoiding marriage, Aphrodite's lovely boon. —
       She learned at last, refuse it as she might.
- 1295-8   Don't get me all stirred up, lad, with my woes, or let my love for you bear me away down to Persephone's abode. Beware God's anger and men's gossip, and be kind.
- 1299-1304   How long, lad, will you run away? I'm chasing
           you,
           seeking you: let me have some finish-line to catch you at! But you with proud and reckless heart

flee, with the cruel nature of a kite.

No, wait for me—give me your favour! Not for long

will blue-wreathed Aphrodite's boon be yours.

- 1305-10 The lovely bloom of boyhood's faster than a sprint in passing: ponder that, and let me off the chain, or one day you too, cruel lad, may be oppressed and find the going hard in love, as I do now towards you. Bear these points in mind,
and don't succumb to bad . . .

- 1311-18 I saw you cheating on me, lad—I'm keeping track with these men that you're now in harmony and friendship with, discarding my regard for you as worthless. You were not their friend before;
I thought to make of you my faithful comrade, you alone. Well, fine, now take another friend, but I am down, your benefactor. Let no man, observing you, feel drawn to love of lads.

- 1319-22 Lad, as the Cyprian's made you so desirable and all the young men dote upon your looks, hear what I say, and set your heart to favour me:
accept that love's hard for a man to bear. .

- 1323-6 Goddess of Cyprus, end my pain, disperse the cares
that gnaw my heart, restore my happiness, break off my morbid brooding, grant me cheerfulness
and better sense: I've had my span of youth.

- 1327-34 Lad, while your chin stays whiskerless, I'll never cease
praising you, even till my fated death.
It's graceful still for you to give, and no disgrace for me to ask. So, for our parents' sake, show me respect, lad, and your favour: so may
you
in turn enjoy fair Aphrodite's boon when you're in need and chase another lad. God grant

you get the same response that you give me!

1335-6 Happy the lover who can exercise at home—
in bed beside a nice lad, all day long.

1337-40 I love the lad no more: I've given pain the boot, escaped from all that hassle with relief.

I stand released from fair-crowned Aphrodite's chains

of longing—but no thanks to you, my lad.

1351-2 Take an old man's advice: don't go carousing, lad.
For a young chap it isn't suitable.

1357-60 Lad-lovers always wear a stern yoke on their necks,

a harsh memento of convivial nights.

In working on a lad's affection, you've to set your hand to a short-flaring vine-twigg fire.

1361-2 You've lost my love, lad, run yourself upon a reef and grabbed for safety at a rotten rope.

1363-4 I'll never harm you, even when we part. No man will ever talk me out of loving you.

1365-6 Most handsome and adorable of lads, stand there, just let me say a word or two.

1367-8 A lad shows gratitude, whereas a woman keeps no lasting friend—she loves whoever's by.

1369-72 A lad's love's good to have, and good to lay aside, much easier to find than to fulfil.

It comes with countless woes attached, and countless joys;

yet there's some pleasure even in the pain.

1373-4 You've never ever stayed for my sake. In response to every earnest message, off you go.

1375-6 Happy lad-lover, if he's never known the sea and does not fear benighting on the waves.

1377-80 Lad, you're a fine chap, but because of feckless
friends

you mix with knaves and so disgrace yourself.

I didn't want to lose your friendship, but I'm glad
I did, behaving as a free man should.

1381-5 We all thought you'd been sent to bring us something nice
from golden Aphrodite . . .
. . . but blue-wreathed Aphrodite's gift becomes a thing most burdensome for men to bear,
unless the goddess grants deliverance.

1386-9 Goddess from Cyprus, cunning schemer, why did Zeus
honour you with this special privilege?
For you can overpower men's reason; there is none clever or strong enough to get away.

XENOPHANES

- 1 For now the floor is clean, and everybody's hands and cups; a servant garlands us with wreaths;
another offers fragrant perfume from a dish;
the mixing-bowl's set up, brimful of cheer,
and further jars of wine stand ready, promising never to fail—soft wine that smells of flowers.
The frankincense sends out its holy scent all round the room; there's water, cool and clear and sweet;
bread lies to hand, gold-brown; a splendid table,
too,
with cheeses and thick honey loaded down.
The altar in the middle's decked about with
flowers;
festivity and song pervade the house.
The first thing men of sense should do is sing of God
in words of holiness and purity, with a libation and a prayer for means to do what's right; that's more straightforward, after
all,
than crimes. Then drink what you can hold and still get home
unaided (if, of course, you're not too old).
Applaud the man who brings out good things in his cups,
so that attention is attuned to good:
don't be relating wars of Titans or of Giants or Centaurs, fictions of the men of old, or strife and violence. There's no benefit in that.
No, always keep the gods duly in mind.
- 2 But if at running someone won a victory or in pentathlon* at Olympia by Pises' stream and Zeus's precinct, or again in wrestling, or the boxer's painful art,

or that demanding trial they call pankration,* he'd be more glamorous in the city's eyes;
 he'd get a front seat at competitive events,
 and meals provided from the public purse by vote of the city, and a prize to keep for aye—e'en if he won with steeds. He'd get all that without deserving it as I do, for my brain is worth much more than men's or horses' brawn.

This custom's quite irrational; it isn't right to value brawn above the boon of brain.
 For just because there's some good boxer in the town

or some good wrestler or pentathlon man or champion runner—which is most admired of all physical feats wherein men do compete—that won't improve the law and order in the town;
 there's little joy for the community in someone winning contests by the Pises' banks:
 that doesn't make the city's coffers fat.

3 And learning useless luxury from Lydia, while they were free from hateful tyranny,
 they'd go to the piazza in full purple robes,
 a thousand of them at the very least,
 proud in the splendour of their finely coiffured hair
 and sleek with unguents of the choicest scent.

5 Nor would one pour wine first to mix within the cup,
 but water first and wine on top of it.

6 You sent the thighbone of a kid, and got instead a fatted ox's leg—a worthy share for one whose fame will spread all over Greece, and last
 as long as there are singers in the land.

7-7a Now I will start upon another argument and show the path . . .

(On Pythagoras)*

And once, they say, while he was passing by, he saw
a puppy being beaten, and he said
'Oh, stop, don't thrash him—that's the soul of my good friend;
I recognized it when I heard it yelp.'

8 Already threescore years and seven have passed away,
batting my careworn consciousness through Greece,
and there were five and twenty from my birth to then,
if I can claim to know the truth of it.

9 Much feebler than a man advanced in age.

A 14 This is not an equal challenge, sinner versus moral
man.

14 Yet mortal men imagine gods are born and dress like them, are shaped like them, and have their speech.

45 I batted myself on from town to town.

SIMONIDES

Victory Odes

- 506 Which of the men of today has bound on his brows
in myrtle leaves or wreaths of rose so many victories in regional competition?
- 507 That Ram was duly fleeced* when he went to the splendid wooded precinct of Zeus.
- 508 As when in the month of storms
Zeus chastens fourteen days,
that men on earth call time of forgotten winds,
holy brood-time of the coloured kingfisher.
- 509 Not even the strong Polydeuces would hold up his fists against him, or the iron son of Alcmena.*
- 511 [Heaven-bor]n Kronos' glorious son [himself] [honour]s Aiatios' clan; far-shooting Apollo of the golden lyre marks it out, and shining Delphi, where the horse-race . . .
. . . . .
- [by proclamation most welcome
they declared the man of Pyrrhus' line*
king supreme of the province; and . . .
with good fortune for Thessaly, and for all the people . . .
- 512 Drink, drink at this fortune!
- 515 Hail, daughters of storm-swift mares.*
- 516 And the dust went up from your chariot-wheel
for the wind to carry away.
- 517 in case he let the brown straps slip from his hands.

519 fr. 79

Whoever . . .
 let him be cheerful even though he's let . . . fall to the ground.
 Many men pray . . . and to win prestige
 by mounting fair-named Victory's car, but only for one does the goddess make room so he can leap aboard her great chariot.

519 fr. 92

And may he walk round
 . . . with a new race completed . . .
 . . . cheerful . . . prosperity to come . . .
 I rejoice, and hold a protecting arm about him, like a mother round her youngest son.

Paeans

519 fr. 32

. . . of the doughty Carians . . .
 . . . on the banks of . . . 's streams they set up a fair [dance in the] meadows; for now [the goddess]*
 was burdened with the private toils of birth.
 . . . cried out . . . from her holy womb, and . . .
 sent forth . . . Hear me . . .

519 fr. 35

. . . from holy Parnes . . .
 . . . look down, Apollo on the land of . . . Athena.
 . . . here well-disposed
 . . . spring will not pass.
 . . . we support the toil . . .
 . . . the virgin Artemis who runs in the mountains; and thee, far-shooting lord, we [hymn] with gentle [strains], uttering auspicious cry
 that comes from hearts in concord.

519 fr. 55

. . . the glens . . . Lycian [Apollo,] her finest of sons. Ië, ië!
 Cry hallelujah, Delian maids, with reverent [dance!]

[when sp]ring comes. Lady of D[elos, gold of] face,
 . . . we in song . . . fortune . . .

519 fr. 77

. . . of spring . . .
 . . . of white . . . garlands . . .
 . . . sprouting many a . . .
 and carrying many leaves
 of the native [bay?] he approached, regardless of Poseidon, the master of the earth.

Dirges

520 Man's strength is but little, and futile his concerns, his lifespan short, filled with trouble on trouble;
 and over it death, inescapable, uniform, looms,
 to be dispensed in equal shares
 to high and low alike.

521 As you are mortal, don't ever affirm what tomorrow will bring,
 or how long the man that you see in good fortune
       will keep it:
 not even the wing-spreading house-fly changes perch so fast.

522 For all things come to the same Charybdis and are flushed away,
 all great distinction and wealth.

523 Not even those of former times, hero sons of the lords of heaven, lived lives free of toil and danger and death unto old age.

524 But then death overtakes
 even the man who flees from the fight.

- 526     None wins distinction without the gods, no man, no city. God is the one who can contrive all things: in mortal life
         nothing is safe from harm.
- 527     There is no ill that men should not expect;
         in a short space of time God reshuffles everything.
- 531     When men die [for their country,] fame is their fortune, fair their fate, their tomb an altar; in the place of wailing there is remembrance, and their dirge is praise.
         This winding-sheet is such as neither mould nor Time that conquers all can fade; this sepulchre of fine men has adopted as its sacristan Greece's good name. Witness Leonidas,* the king of Sparta: he has left a monument of valour, and perennial fame.

From various lyric poems

- 538     All larks must sport a crest.
- 541     . . . distinguishes fair and foul. And if someone who has no shutters to his mouth cavils, why, smoke is ineffectual stuff, gold does not stain, and truth alone prevails. But God grants few men such distinction as endures throughout: it is no easy thing to keep high standards, for despite himself a man is overborne
         by irresistible desire of gain or the scheming Love-goddess's compelling itch or lively rivalries.
         Still, if he cannot keep
         the path of sanctity throughout his life, but to his best ability . . .
- 542     For a man to be truly good is difficult, fashioned foursquare in hands and feet and mind
         without a blemish . . .

Nor does the saying of Pittacus ring true to me, although a wise man was its source:
he said that being good was difficult.

That honour's God's alone: a man can't help but sink, if he be caught by helpless circumstance.

Any man's good if his affairs go well,
and bad if they go badly; so they're best for longest, whom the immortals bless.

Therefore I will not waste my allotted span of life in vain and insubstantial hope, trying to find what is not possible,
a perfect human soul, of all of us who cull the broad earth's fruits—
I'll tell you if I do.

No, I commend and favour anyone who does no scurvy thing from choice—even the gods can't fight necessity.

. . . . .

. . . I'm not bent on finding fault. It's good enough for me if someone's not a rogue or too shiftless, and knows the public good that comes from righteousness, a sane man; I'll not criticize him, for the breed of fools is infinite.
All things are fair that have no foul mixed in.

543 . . . Danae, when in the carven chest* the wind blowing and the sea stirring shattered her with fear. Her cheeks were wet as she put her loving arm round Perseus, saying,
'Oh, child! What trouble is mine, yet you can slumber, in your innocence snoring on comfortless timber, bronze-riveted, in the black gloom of unlit night.

The passing wave's deep spray upon your hair disturbs you not, or the wind's keening, as you lie in your royal-red shawl, bonny face.

If fear were fear to you,
even the sound of my words
would catch your tiny ear.

Yes, sleep, baby; and sleep, sea!

Sleep, measureless misery!

O father Zeus,

grant some sign of a change of thy will;
and if I speak too bold at all, or out of place, forgive me.'

571 and I am paralysed
by the din of the purple brine as it surges all round.

545 (Jason)

He settled in Corinth, he did not dwell in Magnesia; and living with his Colchian wife he ruled over Thranos and Lechaeum.

550 (Aegeus gave Theseus)

a red sail, stained with the juice of the springing holm-oak's bloom.

551 I would have brought you a greater blessing—life—had I come earlier.*

553 They wept for violet-wreathed Eurydice's poor unweaned babe, as he breathed out his sweet life-soul.

555 well given by Hermes god of the contest, son of Maia, the mountain nymph with curling lashes, loveliest of the seven
dear dark-tressed daughters that Atlas fathered, called
the Doves of heaven, the Peleiades.*

559 As for you, mother of twenty,
be gracious, Hecuba.

564 . . . Meleager, who in the javelin beat all the young men, hurling over Anauros' eddying stream from Iolcus' vineland: so have Homer and Stesichorus sung the tale to all.

- 595 For not so much as a breeze to shake a leaf then moved, that might prevent the honeysweet voice of the Sirens as it spread abroad from lodging in their mortal ears.*
- 567 And over Orpheus' head birds without number flew,
while straight up from the darkling wave
the fish leapt to his lovely song.
- 572 Against the men of Corinth Ilios nurses no wrath, nor the Danaans.
- 575 (Eros)
You cruel child of scheming Aphrodite that she bore to the evil god of war.
- 577(a) (Cassotis,*)
where for cleansing of hands the lovely-haired Muses' holy water is drawn from below.
- 577(b) Clio, that watchest over the holy cleansing of hands . . . gold-robed . . .
as for many a prayer they draw the lovely, fragrant water from the ambrosial depths.
- 579 There is a tale
that Merit dwells on high rocks, hard to climb
. . . patrols the holy place.
Not all men's eyes may look upon her—only he who sheds heart-stinging sweat and reaches the summit of manly endeavour.
- 581 Who of sound mind could assent to that Lindian, Cleobulus,* who against the perennial flow of rivers, the flowers of spring, the flame of the sun, the gold of the moon and swirl of the sea
pitted the strength of a mere tombstone?
All things yield to the gods: a stone even man's arts can shatter. That was the thought of a fool.
- 582 Even silence has its reward of safety.

- 583 You cock of delightful voice.
584 For, void of pleasure, what human life's desirable, what monarchy?
Without that, even the gods' eternity were nothing enviable.
585 From her red mouth
the girl gave voice.
586 When the twittering
sallow-necked nightingales of spring . . .
587 For this was what the Centaurs most abhorred:
fi-ire.*
590 Even what's tough
becomes attractive in emergencies.
591 Horse-breeding does not go with a Zacynthus, but with fertile acres.
592 Beside the pure refiner's gold not even having lead to show.
593 The bee frequents the flowers, contriving the yellow honey.
594 A glorious reputation is the last thing to sink below the earth.
597 Sonorous harbinger of fragrant spring, blue swallow.
598 Appearance even overbears the truth.
599 And he with sweet sleep in his gift . . .
600 A wind pricking into the sea.
601 Man-mastering sleep.
602 The new wine cannot yet discredit last year's offering from the vine.
This is the empty-headed claim of boys.* 603 For what has come to pass will not now be undone.
604 Not even lovely skill in poetry gives any joy, unless one has the dignity of health.
605 There's only one sun in the sky.

Elegiac poems

The Battle of Artemisium

el. 3      by the immortals' will . . .
             Zetes and Kalais* . . .

. . . . .
 . . . . .
 . . . . .
 . . . . .

[They came as swif]t as dee[r, the sons of Boreas]
 [and Oreithyia,] maid with lovely hair.

[They stirred the] sea up from its murky bed, [and roused]

[the Old Man, b]right-famed [guardian] of the deep,

[who spoke in prophecy:] 'What is this distant [din]

[I hear] b[rush]ing my ears, [as of a battle?']

el. 9      throwing sticks and stones upon . . .

The Battle of Plataea

el. 10      . . . for m[y compos]ition . . .

[O son of] sea-[nymph],* glorious in thy fame.

el. 11      str[uck you . . . and you fell, as when a larch]
             or pine-tree in the [lonely mountain] glades is felled by woodcutters . . .
             and much . . .

[A great grief seized] the war-host; [much they honoured you,]

[and with Patr]oclus' [ashes mingled yours.]

[It was no ordinary mortal] laid you low,

[ 'twas by Apoll]o's hand [that you were struck.]

[Athena] was at [hand, and smote the famous
 t]ow[n]

[with Hera: they were wro]th with Priam's sons [because of P]aris' wickedness. The car of God's Justice o'ertakes [the sinner in the end.]

[And so] the valiant Danaans, [best of warr]iors, sacked the much-sung-of city, and came [home;]

[and they] are bathed in fame that cannot die, by grace

[of one who from the dark-]tressed Muses had the tru[th entire,] and made the heroes' short-lived race

a theme familiar to younger men.

[But] now farewell, [thou son] of goddess glorious,
[daughter] of Nereus of the sea, while I [now summon] thee, i[llustrious] Muse, to my support,

[if thou hast any thought] for men who pray:
[fit ou]t, as is thy wont, this [grat]eful song-a[rray]
[of mi]ne, so that rem[embrance is preserved] of those who held the line for Spart[a and for Greece,]

[that none should see] the da[y of slavery.]
They kept their co[urage, and their fame rose] heaven-high;

[their glory in] the world [will] never die.
[From the Eu]rotas and from [Sparta's] town they [marched,] accompanied by Zeus' horsemaster sons, [the Tyndarid] Heroes, and by Menelaus'

strength,*

[those doughty] captains of [their fath]ers' folk, led forth by [great Cleo]mbrotus' most noble [son,]
... Pausanias.

[They quickly reached the Isthmus] and the famous land

of Corinth, [furthest bounds] of Pelops' [isle,] [and Megara, N]isus' [ancient] city, where the r[est]

[then joined the army from] the country round.
[Again they marched, the ome]ns giving confidence,

[and soon they reached Eleusis'] lovely plain, driving [the Persians from Pan]dion's [land, by help]

of that most godlike se[er, the Iamid.*]

... overcame ...

- el. 13        to drive away [the army] of the Medes and Persians, and . . .
              the sons of Dorus* and of Heracles.
When they [came down] into [the broad Boeotian] plain
              and [the Medes] facing them came into view,
. . . they sat down (?) . . .

- el. 14 (Prophecy of Tisamenus) [. . . cl]ash of blows on [shields]
[. . . I de]clare that, should the a[rmy pr]ess [across] the river* first . . .
a great disaster will [be theirs; but if they wait,] [a victory that] ne'er shall be for[got.]
[And . . .] will drive them [out of A]si[a too]
              [with Zeus'] approval, favouring a n[ew] alliance; for [. . . will la]y a firm base . . .

- el. 15+16
              And in the centre stood well-watered Ephya's
              men,
              well versed in every martial excellence,
and those who dwelt in Corinth, Glaucus' capital.
              They had the finest witness to their work—
of precious gold, in heaven, one that magnifies their fathers' far-famed glory with their own.

- el. 19        This finest single thing the Chian said:* .
              'As is the breed of leaves, e'en so is that of man.'
              Few mortals who have had that in their ears have taken it to heart, for everyone relies on hope; it's planted in a young man's breast.

- el. 20        . . . only a short time . . .
              . . . abiding . . .
A mortal, while he has the lovely bloom of youth,
              has many empty-headed, vain ideas.
He has no expectation of old age or death,
              and while in health, has no thought of disease.
They're fools who have that attitude, and do not know
              the time allowed to us for youth and life is short. Take note of this, and till your days are done

don't waver, treat your soul to all that's nice.

. . . Ponder the [saying of a man] of old—for Homer's tongue's escaped [oblivion;]

all-conquer[ing Time has spared him, never dimmed his name,]

[and never found his testimony] false.

. . . in festivity . . .

. . . well-turned [arguments (?)]

el. 21

My soul, I cannot be your watchful guardian.

I've ruefully respected pure-faced Right ever since first I saw on my young growing thighs

the signs that my boy's life was at an end, and that the ivory gleam was interspersed with black,

and from the snows . . .

Restrained by in[hibition . . .] youth's disorderly

el. 22

I should like to sail

[with cargo] of the dark-wreathed [Muses'] art and come to that tree-shaded home [of sainted

men,]

that airy island where life has its crown;

and there I'd see my auburn Echecratidas

[with these old ey]es, and take him by the hand, so that his lovely skin's young bloom [should breathe on me,]

and he'd distil sweet longing from his eyes.

Reclining [with the l]ad among the flowers, I'd

[have]

[a lovely time, slough] my white wrinkles off;

and for my hair I'd weave a fresh, delightful wreath

of new-sprung [galingale . . .]

and I would sing a charming, clear-voiced [song of

love,]

plying my tongue in elo[quent . . .]

el. 23

Wine, defence against unhappiness.

- el. 24        Nothing of Bacchus' must be cast aside, even a grape-pip.
- el. 25        The stuff* with which the North Wind, rushing down from Thrace,
              once made a covering for Olympus' flanks,
              and stung the hearts of cloakless men, and then withdrew,
              buried alive in the Pierian soil—let me be served my share of that too. It's not nice to bring a friend a warm drink for a toast.
- el. 26        For broad as it was,* it did not reach to me.
- el. 86        But if, daughter of Zeus, the best must be acclaimed,
              then Athens' people did it all alone.
- el. 87        And best of witnesses, the gold that shines in heaven.
- el. 88        Time has sharp teeth, and gnaws
              all things away, even the mightiest.
- el. 89        For memory none, I claim, can match Simonides, eighty years old, son of Leoprepes.
- el. 90        A man learns from the community.
- el. 91        When I behold the tomb of Megacles,
              I feel your suffering, poor Callias.
- el. 92*        Muse, sing to me of the fair-ankled Alcmena's son:
the son of Alcmena sing to me, Muse, the fair-ankled one.

SUSARION

Oyez, Oyez! Announcement by Susarion, Philinus' son, Megarian from Tripodisc.
Woman's a pest. But all the same, parishioners, no household can exist without aforesaid pest:
for marry or stay single, either's damnable.

APOLLODORUS

701

Who at such a time
has come to the edge of the doorway?

CYDIAS

Mind you don't become a fawn in the face of a lion seeking a share of the meat.

948

A far-faring call of the lyre.

PRATINAS

- 708 What commotion is this?* What cavortings are these?
What hooliganism's invading the old Dionysiac knockabout altar?
He's mine, my Bromios, mine is the clamour, the banging,
the speeding over the mountains with the Naiads,
shaping a dapple-winged melody like a swan.
The Muse established singing as queen: let the pipe,
being the servant, dance in second place,
content to take the field only for drunken young fellows' carousing and brawling on doorsteps.
Smash the burbling windy toad, burn the spit-wasting-reedy, the deep-voiced-chattering, the out-of-tune/rhythm-step creature of drill-moulded body.
Here, look here! This is the way to fling your right arm and your leg!
Thriambus-dithyrambus, lord with ivy crown,
give ear, give ear to this my Dorian dance!
- 709 The chirper's a Laconian, well set for the dance.
- 710 Not ploughing furrowed land but seeking virgin soil.
- 711 sweet-voiced quail.
- 712 Do not pursue either the tense or the relaxed Ionian Muse,* but plough the intermediate field and be Aeolian in your song . . .
. . . Befitting
all song-roisterers
is the Aeolian tuning.

ANONYMOUS PARTY SONGS

- 884 Pallas Tritogeneia, queen Athena, keep this town on its feet, and all its people,
so it's free from griefs, free from disputes,
free from untimely deaths—you and your father Zeus.
- 885 Of Demeter, of Wealth's Olympian mother,
let me sing at this time of wearing garlands,
and of thee, O Persephone, Zeus' daughter: both hail, and take care of this city well.
- 886 Once in Delos did Leto bear her children, Phoebus golden of hair, the lord Apollo,
and the one who shoots deer in the wild,
Artemis, who for all women has power supreme.
- 887 O Pan, ruler of far-renowned Arcadia, dance-companion of nymphs of Dionysus:
may you smile, O Pan, favourably,
gratified by this glad-spirited song of mine.
- 888 We're victorious as we hoped we would be:
the gods gave us the victory; they brought it from Pandrosos . . .
. . . beloved Athena . . .
- 889 Oh, if only one could examine each man's nature, open his chest to check his feelings;
then you'd close it back up again, then truly acknowledge him friend with an open heart.
- 890 Health's the finest of all things for a mortal;
second-best is to be attractive-looking;
and the third-best's wealth, honest-john wealth;
fourth-best's enjoying life's prime with your favourite pals.
- 892 Now this is what the crab said
as the snake in his claw he caught:
'A friend should be straightforward, and think no devious thought.'

- 893 I will carry my sword in sprigs of myrtle
like Harmodius and Aristogeiton*
when they killed the foul tyrant, and made Athens a place of laws equal for everyone.
- 894 Dear Harmodius, you're not dead, I'm sure:
in the Isles of the Blest, they say, you're settled,
where Achilles fleet-footed is too,
and, as they say, the good Diomedes, Tydeus' son.
- 895 I will carry my sword in sprigs of myrtle
like Harmodius and Aristogeiton
on Athena's great festival day, when they both struck the foul tyrant Hipparchus
dead.
- 896 Your great glory will live on earth for ever,
dear Harmodius and Aristogeiton, that you killed the foul tyrant, and made Athens a place of laws equal for everyone.
- 898 Son of Telamon, spearman Ajax, you, they say, were best of the Danaans, after Achilles, that went to Troy.
- 899 Telamon was the first, they say, and Ajax next of the Danaans, after Achilles, that went to Troy.
- 900 I wish I were a lovely lyre of ivory, and lovely boys would take me to their dithyrambic dance.
- 901 I wish I were a lovely pendant, big, fine gold, and a lovely lady would wear me
with purity in her heart.
- 902 Drink with me, frolic and love with me, with me put on the garland;
rave with me when I rave, and when I'm sober, be sober.
- 904 The old sow's got a nice acorn,
but has her heart set on another;
and I've got one pretty girl,
but have my heart set on another.

- 905 Bath-attendants and tarts practise parallel arts:
they douse tramp and toff
in one communal trough.
- 907 Oh, Leipsydryon,* that betrayed our comrades, oh, what men you've destroyed, both good in battle
and of noble blood, men who indeed showed on that day from what fathers they had their birth.
- 908 He who betrays not his friend wins great esteem
among both mortals and gods, as I opine.
- 909 I'm plenty rich, I've got my spear, my sword,
my lovely oxhide to protect my skin.
With this I sow, with this I reap,
with this I tread the sweet wine from the grapes,
with this I'm titled master of the serfs.
And those not bold enough for spear, for sword,
for lovely oxhide to protect their skins,
why, they all cower at my knees,
prostrate themselves . . .
addressing me as master and great king.
- 911 Never ever was such a man in Athens
as Harmodius and Aristogeiton.
- 912(a) You cannot play the fox or be friends with both sides.
- 912(b) Money and livelihood for me and Clitagora with the Thessalians.
- 913 A mortal man needs little—only love and fodder; but you're really miserly.

TIMOCREON

- 727* Well, you may approve of Pausanias or of Xanthippus
or Leotychidas, but I approve of Aristides as the one best man to come from Athens, since Themistocles forfeits the favour of Leto:
the criminal liar and traitor, who, bribed by the silver
of knaves, refused to help Timocreon
his friend back to his home, Ialysos, but took three silver talents and sailed off into the sunset, to blazes,
restoring some wrongfully, killing or exiling others;
and at the Isthmus,* loaded up to here with cash, he made a comical Mine Host and served the meat cold. So they ate, and prayed God for Themistocles' ruin.
- 728 Muse, make this song famous through Greece,
as is only right and proper.
- 729* Oho, Timocreon
is not the only one
to come to terms with Medes!
No, there are other knaves,
I'm not the only fox,
there's other Reynards too!
- 731 Blind god of wealth, you never ought to have appeared on land or sea or anywhere: you ought to stay in Tartarus, by Acheron,
for all men's ills are due to you.
- 732 A smart Sicilian
said to his mum . . .

Iambic and elegiac fragments

- 7 Once, long ago, Milesians were brave.
9 His brain's there to advise, but not his hand.
10 Some Cean blather* fell on my reluctant ears:
on my reluctant lugs some blather fell from Ceos.

EUENUS

- 1 Many men tend to contradict on every point, but contradicting rightly's out of vogue.
Well, as for them there's one old saw that's all we
need:
'you can keep your opinion, I'll keep mine.'
But the intelligent are soon persuadable by reason, and they're easiest to teach.
- 2 Bacchus is measured best not too much, nor too small—
that causes either gloom or mania.
He likes to make a foursome with three water-nymphs:*
that's when he's best equipped for bedding up,
for if he blows too strong, he turns desire away,
and plunges you in sleep—next thing to death.
- 3 I hold that not the smallest part of being wise is knowing truly what each man is like.
- 4 Resolve combined with wisdom brings much benefit;
without it, it brings harm and misery.
- 5 Often men's anger will lay bare their hidden mind;
insanity is nowhere near so bad.
- 6 A son means either fear or pain full-time.
- 7 Contumely,
which brings no gain and none the less does wrong.
- 8a Detain not any of these guests against his will,
nor urge departure if he wants to stay;
don't wake him up, Simonides, if one of us,
well laced with wine, falls prey to gentle sleep,
and don't insist he sleep, if he is wide awake:
compulsion's always disagreeable.
If someone wants to drink, let slaves stand by to pour;
one doesn't get a nice time every night.

But I'll go home—I've had my measure of sweet wine—

and think of sleep, that frees us from all ills.
I've reached the stage where wine sits sweetest in
a man:

I'm neither sober, nor unduly drunk.
When someone overshoots the measure of his drink,
he's no more in control of tongue and mind.
He says wild things that make the sober blush, and feels

no shame in anything he does while drunk—
a level-headed man before, but now a fool.

Take note of this, and do not drink too much, but either rise before you're drunk (don't let your greed

bully you like some wretched daily help) or, if you stay, don't drink. But no, you always chirp

this foolish 'Fill her up!' That's why you're drunk.

Yes, one's a loving-cup, another's been set up, one's for the gods' libation, one's a scone—you can't say no. In truth, your champion's he that drinks

cup after cup and yet says nothing rude.
Well, stay and make good talk beside your mixing-bowl;

avoid disputes as long as e'er you may;
speak openly, let all hear what you say to one:
that way a party turns out not half bad.

8b If I had wealth, Simonides, as once I had,
I'd not feel bad in high-class company;
but now I see it pass me by, and I've no voice, from want, though I'd have judged better than most
that we're adrift, our white sails shipped before the storm,
upon the Melian sea* in blackest night.

They can't agree to bale out, while the waves wash
in

on both sides. We can scarce hope to survive, the way they're going on: they've sacked the excellent

helmsman who always kept such skilful watch;
they're plundering the cargo, and all order's gone;
there's no more sharing out on equal terms;
the porters rule; rogues lord it over men of worth.

I fear the sea may swallow up the ship.

There, that's my coded message to the upper class;
and even a hick may grasp it, if he's smart.

8c Alas, I love a soft-skinned lad, who shows me up to all our friends against my every wish.

I'll bear it unconcealed—one's often forced to things;

it's no bad-looking boy I've fallen for.

Boy-love's a pleasure; after all, once Kronos' son,
king of immortals, fell for Ganymede, seized him and took him to Olympus, gave him rank

divine, with all his lovely boyhood's bloom.

Therefore, Simonides, don't wonder if I too am found in thrall to a delightful lad.

9 I hold it is long practice, friend, and this constitutes human nature in the end.

10 The cleverest and most stupid thing is—time.

LAMPROCLES

- 735 Pallas the sacker of cities I hymn, the valiant virgin horse-taming daughter of mighty Zeus.
- 736 Pleiades, you that are set in the sky
sharing the name of the doves that fly.

ATTRIBUTED TO TERPANDER

- 697        Once more of the lord far-shooting let my heart sing.
- 698        Zeus, thou first of all,
             that lead'st the way for all, O Zeus, I send to thee
             this first fruit of my songs.

PRAXILLA

747 (Adonis' lament in the underworld)

The sun's light is the finest thing I leave behind, and next the shining stars and the moon's face,
and the ripe apples, pears, and cucumbers.

748 (Achilles)

But they could ne'er persuade the heart within your breast.

749=897

Mark the saying of Admetus, my friend: cleave to the men of class,
keep away from the rogues, seeing that rogues seldom show gratitude.

750=903

Let me warn you, my friend: scorpions lie hid under every stone:
watch out lest you get stung: what you can't see bodes every sort of trap.

754

O Miss, from out your window blowing kisses—
a Miss by your face, but lower down a Mrs.

Iambic fragments

- 1 Plenty of space, by courtesy of Syloson.*
2 And many are the waves of the wide sea
the South Wind rolls between us.
3 Abdera, Teos' fair-built colony.
5 To Xanthe, aged lady, much beloved by women.
36 Go on, tread on their necks, yes, tread them to the ground.
37 A stout-legged woman grinding corn, being jigged against the millstone.
39a I am enfeebled, I have little strength.
50 Crying 'Bow wow!' and barking like a dog.
52 I'm in love, Leucippus, under a lucky nuthatch.
55 Either a treble six or a treble one.
55a And this is what he said:
'Thine is the power, O king.' 56 He's gone off
taking the loot for himself.

Elegiac fragments

- 1 Sons of Ariston, godlike stock of famous sire.
2 Whereas a man of worth's now wretch, now gent.
2a As wolves love a lamb, so lovers love a lad.
3 Goodness is one; of vice there's every sort.
4 Many a friendship by not speaking's been dissolved.

- 5 Athenians no longer know Megarians.
- 6 Pour one for Kedon,* waiter, do not leave him out,
if men of quality deserve their wine.
- 7 The South-West wind soon clouds, soon clears the sky,
but the Northwester brings up all the clouds.
- 8 I care no more for music or for song.
- 9 This was the rightest of all his wrongful deeds.
- 10 He was a good man, but he met his better.
- 11 Girls lifting their light footsteps in the dance.
- 12 Even the worthless man's esteemed in times of strife.
- 13 At long last we have both come to our senses, lad.
- 17 Over the Stenyclerian Plain, to the mountain top, Aristomenes* pursued the Spartan foe.
- 19 The gods implanted no good sense in piper-men:
even as they blow, their brains fly out as well.
- 20 And we sailed off into the Hellespont.
- 21 Zeus alone has cures for everything.
- 22 For any issue there's no better test than time, which brings even men's inmost thoughts to
light.
- 23 If only hidden opportunity were plain to see. It's best increased by wariness.
- 24 Endure even a harsh deal from the gods.
- 25 Youth's always wayward; that's how human beings
are.
Far worse, though, if it injures what is right.
- 26 To the watchman his watch, to the lover his errand of love.
- 27 Hail, fellow drinkers, agemates: from this happy
start
I'll bring my discourse to a happy end.
When friends foregather for occasions such as this,
we ought to laugh and joke in high-class style,

enjoy each other's company, make silly chat
 and banter such as fosters merriment.
 The serious talk should follow, with each speaker heard
 in turn: that's what symposiums are for.
 But let's be guided by the MC: that's what fine fellows must do, and show their eloquence.

Melic fragments

- 873 You lads who are blessed with charm and with fine fathers,
 do not begrudge society your bloom,
 for beside manliness
 relaxing Love too flourishes
 in Chalcis' townships.
- 878 He pipes on Mariandyne reeds, striking Ionian notes.
- 938(f) O father Zeus, I wish I could be rich.
- 941 Now make we libation to Memory's daughters
 the Muses, and likewise
 the Muses' leader,
 the son of Leto.
- 942 Polyhymnia,* maid who gives delight to all.
- 943 More delicate than a narcissus.
- 944 (A woman speaks)
 Do not wear out
 my own swift feet, or my brothers' (sisters').
- 946 The destiny of men who have won the highest rank goes on to its goal.
- 947 For the Muse does not shiftlessly taste only what's before her, but advances harvesting everything . . .
 Pray do not make her stop,
 now that delightful melodies have been started by the fair-crying pipe with its manifold notes.

950(a) God born in Delos, whether you are now in Lycia . . .

950(b) Golden-haired Archer, son of Zeus.

950(c) And then the earth and the world stream's waters vanished into night.

952 (Zeus gave Alcmena a goblet)
And she took and admired straightway the golden cup.

955 Artemis, my heart desires to weave you a beautiful hymn, while another takes up in her hands
the bronze-faced castanets that gleam like gold.

957 Asteris, neither I nor Apelles loves you.

961 Never will I accept prestige as the reward of dishonest gain.

964 Countless garlands decorate the earth.

975 If you oversee the rites of the white-armed goddess of love.

976 (A woman sings)
The moon and the Pleiads have quit the sky;
the small hours lie ahead.
The time for love is passing by,
and I'm alone in my bed.

978(a) And Zeus' high hall resounded.

978(b) Hearken, daughter of Zeus and . . .

986 The highest state of man is to enjoy what's fine, and have the means.

989 Ilion perished in flames over Helen.

998 (Castor and Pollux aid sailors in storms,) softening the violent sea's assault and the wind's swift blasts.

999 Stowing the great sail away at the foot of the mast
he runs from the darkling sea.

1000 . . . before the storm, as at a sea-cape with the North Wind blowing sharp.

- 1001 I declare
the dark-tressed Muses have dealt him well.
- 1002 I hate to drink with anyone inclined to remember things.
- 1004 When the seaman is struck by his want of the Tyndarid brothers.*
- 1005 Over the calm, clear-shining water with smiling face there came to them the longing for a bench in a ship to scar the sea, assaulting the divine.
- 1007 Not sand or dust or feathers of birds of varied plumage
would pile up in such profusion.
- 1009 Then he will lie in the deep-wooded earth,
excluded from symposiums, lyre-music,
and the pipes' delightful cry.
- 1011 Going to see Helen of the curling lashes.
- 1014 But she, the cause of much strife,
the lady Helen . . .
- 1016 Hymn we the Blessed Ones, Muses, Zeus' daughters,
in songs that shall not perish.
- 1017 (On Fate)
And what she approves with even a nod of her brows
must submit to the dispensation of powerful necessity.

Work songs

- 849 Toss me the mostest sheaf, toss me a sheaf!
- 869 Grind, mill, grind:
even Pittacus used to grind,
the ruler of great Mytilene.

Play songs

- 852 Where are my roses, where are my violets, where's my pretty celery?
 Here are the roses, here are the violets,
 here's the pretty celery.
- 861* I'm bringing out a lame little billy-goat.
- 875* 'Who's got the pot—' '—on the boil?'
 'Who's at the pot?' 'Me, Midas!'
- 876a (Blind Man's Buff)*
 'I'll hunt this brazen fly.'
 'You'll hunt, but you won't catch!'
- 876(b) Shine, sun, we love you!*
- 876(c) 'Torty-tortoise,* what are you at in the middle?'
 'I'm winding wool, Milesian thread I twiddle.'
 'And that baby of yours, now how did he get himself bumped?'
 'Off the white horses into the sea he JUMPED!'

Ritual songs

- 848 The swallow, the swallow is here,* bringing a fine new year:
 white belly, dark back;
 so from your rich rack
 roll out a fruit-pack,
 a cup of wine, please,
 and a punnet of cheese;
 or a bran-loaf or pulse-loaf or so—
 the swallow won't say no.
 Do we go on our road,
 or get what we're owed?
 Give something, fine; if not, we won't let be,
 we'll take the door, or else the lintel-piece, or else the lady sitting there inside—
 she's not so big, we'll fetch her easily.
 So if you're bringing something, make it big.
 Open up to the swallow, open your door:
 it's only children knocking, not old men!

- 851(a) Keep back, make way for the god:*
- erect and bursting, he wants to pass straight through.
- 854 Rain, dear Zeus, rain*
- on our ploughland and plain.
- 856 Come along now, all you sons*
- of manly Sparta's citizens.
- Left arm up to defend with shield,
- right arm bravely the spear to wield,
- with never a thought your life to save—
- that's not the old Spartan way to behave.
- 857 Come along now, sons of Sparta, in your armour
- to dance the war-god's dance.
- 862 A holy boy is born*
- to the lady Brimo: Brimos.
- 868 To Athens let us go.*
- 870 Young, valiant warriors we used to be.*
- And we are now: inspect us if you will.
- And we will be in time, far stronger yet!
- 871 Come to the festival, O Dionysus,*
- to the Eleans' holy temple,
- with the spirits of joy
- enter on bovine hoof,
- worthy bull! Worthy bull!
- 872 Put off our old age till later,*
- O lovely Aphrodite!
- 877 Pass by(?) the bridge, O Maiden;*
- more than ever's thrice ploughed.
- 879(1)* Invoke the god.
- Iacchus, Semele's son, giver of wealth!
- 879(2) Who's by?—A crowd of worthy men!
- 879(3) The wine is poured: invoke the god.
- 881(b) Out you go,
- croaky crow!*
- 882 Take good fortune*
- and take good health
- that we bring from the goddess,
- that she called for herself.

EXPLANATORY NOTES

Archilochus

Epodes: the ancients gave this name to those poems of Archilochus that were in simple strophic form, with one or two short lines following a longer one. In some cases we can group enough fragments together from the same poem to get an idea of its overall plan.

20 Magnesia's: Magnesia on the Maeander was a Greek town in Asia Minor. Its sack by the Cimmerians (see the note on Callinus 5a) sent a shock-wave through Greece.

22 the Siris river lands: a site in south Italy that attracted colonists from Ionia.

105 Glaucus, see: the impending storm is metaphorical. According to the author who quotes the fragment, it stands for battle with Thracians. The heights of Gyrae were some 25 miles north of Paros. Fragment 106 may belong to the same poem.

19 Gyges: king of Lydia, the most powerful state in western Asia Minor. He reigned from about 687 to 652.

24 Gortyn: one of the principal towns of Crete at this period.

26 destroy them as you do destroy: the verb is apollyō, which Apollo's name naturally suggested to a Greek ear.

2 Ismaros: in Thrace, the source of a celebrated wine.

5 Saian: a Thracian tribe.

Semonides

6 A wife?: these two lines are a close paraphrase of Hesiod, Works and Days 702-3.

20 Maia's son: Hermes, a god of herdsmen.

Callinus

5a Cimmerian horde: the Cimmerians were a people from north of the Black Sea. In the late eighth century BC, displaced by Scythian invaders, a large number of them crossed the Caucasus, and over the next half-century they butted their way across Asia Minor, eventually reaching the Aegean.

Eumelus

696 From a processional composed for a Messenian men's chorus to sing at a festival on Delos. Ithome was a mountain in Messene; the god worshipped there was Zeus.

Tyrtaeus

- 2 Pelops' broad sea-circled land: the Peloponnese. Tyrtaeus refers to the legendary migration of the Dorians from central Greece in alliance with Heracles' son Hyllus, whose grandsons or great-grandsons established the three Peloponnesian kingdoms of Sparta, Argos, and Messene.
- 19 Pamphyloi, Hylleis, and Dymanes: the three traditional Dorian tribes, one supposedly descended from Hyllus, the other two from sons of Aegimius, who was a son of Dorus, the mythical ancestor of the Dorians.
- 23a the Aegis: an impenetrable goatskin that guarantees victory; in Homer it is held by Zeus or Athena. Hence our expression 'under the aegis of —'.

Mimnermus

- 4 Tithonus: the mythical Trojan whose beauty so appealed to the Dawn-goddess that she carried him off for herself. She begged Zeus to grant him everlasting life, which he did; but she had not thought to specify everlasting youth, so he just gets older and older and older.
- 9 Aipy we left: a town in Messene. Mimnermus refers to the legend of an early migration from Messene to Asia Minor.
- 11 that great fleece: the Golden Fleece that the Argonauts journeyed to a distant eastern land to get. This was a task laid upon Jason by Pelias, king of Iolcus.
- 12 Aethiopia: the land of the mythical Aethiopes, who dwell close to the sunrise. Only later was the name settled on the people of Sudan.
- 14 Hermos: a river north of Smyrna, now the Gediz. This battle in which the Smyrnaeans beat off the Lydians probably took place in the 660s. We cannot identify the heroic warrior whose qualities Mimnermus contrasts with the feebleness of his hearers.

Alcman

- 1 Lykaithos concerns me not: the obscure figures of Spartan legend mentioned in these lines were probably sons of Hippocoon, usurpers, killed by Castor and Polydeuces. The chorus of girls refers to itself as 'me' in the singular; this is usual in Greek choral song.

Measure and Means: the idea is probably that the advantage goes to those who (unlike the sons of Hippocoon) respect the due measure and do not outreach their means.

a Venetian: it is uncertain whether this refers to the Venetians of the north Adriatic or to a similarly named people in Paphlagonia (north Asia Minor).

the plough: or possibly 'the robe'. Apparently a reference to the accompanying ritual. But the interpretation of the whole sentence is much disputed.

Ainesimbrotas: apparently a woman able to cast love-spells.

Aotis: unknown; perhaps the name of a goddess.

3 as to milady Astymeloisa: in the Greek too there is a play on the girl's name, which means 'on the city's mind'.

56 slayer of Argus: this Homeric title of Hermes seems to have no special relevance here. The point is that he was a herdsman's god.

Sappho

15 Doricha: a courtesan in the Greek colony of Naucratis in Egypt. Sappho's brother Charaxus, a trader, had become expensively involved with her. Fragments 5 and 15 may come from the same poem.

17 Atreus' royal sons: Agamemnon and Menelaus, according to Lesbian legend, established the local cult of the three deities mentioned in this poem on their way home from Troy.

Thyone's son: Dionysus.

23 Hermione: the daughter of Helen.

44 Thebes: not the city of Oedipus, but a town in the Troad.

Ilus' noble descendants: the Trojans, Ilus being the eponymous hero of Ilios.

44A the daughter of Koios: Leto. Koios was one of the Titans, a brother of Kronos.

55 Pieria's roses: Pieria, north of Mount Olympus, was famed as the birthplace of the Muses.

99b son of Zeus and Leto: Apollo.

110 The doorman's feet: the doorman is guarding the chamber where a newly wed couple have retired. The bride's friends outside, in merry mood, make fun of him.

134 the Cyprian goddess: Aphrodite.

140 Adonis is dying: Adonis, whose name came from the Phoenician 'adôn ('Lord'), was one form of the Near Eastern god who was the goddess of love's lover and who died and was mourned annually. This is the earliest mention of his cult in Greece. It was popular especially with women. The song is for some kind of ritual play in which Adonis' death was enacted.

142 Niobe: this woman was unwise enough to boast that she had borne far more children than Leto, who had only two. But those two were Apollo and Artemis, the gods with the power of life and death over boys and girls, and they killed all of Niobe's sons and daughters.

- 166 an egg: no doubt the one from which Helen was reputed to have been born. In the usual version this was the result of Zeus' taking the form of a swan to seduce Leda.

Alcaeus or Sappho

- 42 Makar's island: Lesbos. Makar was its legendary first colonist.

Alcaeus

- 129 Aeolian goddess: Hera. For the trio of deities see the note on Sappho 17.

Hyrrhas' son: Pittacus.

- 130b Onomacles: evidently a figure from recent history, famous as a lone-wolf guerrilla.

- 70 the Atreid line: one noble family in Mytilene, the Pentilidae, claimed descent from Orestes, the son of Agamemnon and grandson of Atreus.

- 298 Aias' sacrilege: this Aias (or Ajax) was the less prominent of the two Homeric heroes bearing this name, the Locrian Aias. His sacrilege is described in the following stanzas.

Priam's daughter: Cassandra.

- 42 Aeacus' son: Peleus. His bride was the sea-nymph Thetis; their son was Achilles. Chiron, a wise and amiable Centaur, was responsible for Achilles' upbringing.

- 44 called on his mother's name: to complain of Agamemnon's overbearing treatment of him in taking away his attractive prisoner of war Briseis. The story is related in book 1 of the Iliad, which Alcaeus is concisely summarizing.

- 395 Xanthus: the alternative name of the river Scamander below Troy. Again Alcaeus alludes to a particular episode in the Iliad (21. 211-21).

- 38 cheating death: Sisyphus instructed his wife not to perform his funeral rites. A dead person whose funeral has not been properly performed is liable to return as a ghost to haunt the living, and this enabled Sisyphus to escape from the underworld and resume his place on earth. His eventual punishment was to be forever rolling a boulder up a hill, only to see it go tumbling down again.

- 359 you void lads of their wits: boys blew through limpet shells to make an interesting noise, and the idea is that they blow their own wits out as they do so. Compare the anonymous elegiac fragment no. 19 (p. 192).

- 354 lord of the Scythian land: in a number of places, especially some of the Greek colonies in the north of the Black Sea, adjoining Scythian territory, Achilles was worshipped as a hero. 'Hero' in this religious context means a dead person whose spirit remains powerful on earth.

Theognis

- 12 founded here: at Megara. The shrine of Artemis there (like that of Zeus, Hera, and Dionysus on Lesbos) was reputed to have been founded by Agamemnon at the time of the Trojan War.
- 432 the Asclepiads: the doctors' union, named after Asclepius the god of healing.
- 549 The silent messenger: a beacon fire.

Solon

Salamis: this poem originally contained about 100 lines. In it Solon urged the despondent Athenians not to give up the struggle with Megara for retention of Salamis; he represented himself as a herald arrived from the island. We are told that the exhortation was effective and that Salamis was duly recovered.

- 2 Sikinos or Pholegandros: petty Aegean islands.
- 4a the eldest country of Ionia: Ionia covers Athens and the surrounding region (Attica), Euboea, most of the islands of the central Aegean, and most of the Greek colonies on the coast of Anatolia. Athens claimed to be the earliest inhabited.
- 10 how mad I am: some of Solon's political opponents had impugned his sanity.
- 11 You raised these men up: the authors who quote these lines supposed the reference to be to the dictatorship of Pisistratus, which began in about 561. But Solon speaks of plural tyrants—perhaps some earlier junta of which we know nothing.
- 13 Athena's and Hephaestus' craft: these were patron deities of craftsmen, at Athens especially of potters.
- 19 Cypris: the goddess of Cyprus, Aphrodite.
- 20 Solon quotes and criticizes a line of Mimnermus (6. 2), who appears to be still alive. The name by which he is addressed, Ligyastades, may mean 'melodious singer'.
- 22a Critias: son of Solon's brother Dropides, and a great-great-grandfather of Plato.

- 36 from whom I lifted boundary-stones: Solon had helped those in the poverty trap by a general cancellation of existing debts. The boundary-stones in question had marked mortgaged land.

Attributed to Homer: Margites

- 5 This appears to be a borrowing from Archilochus (201).

Stesichorus

The Song of Geryon: this poem related one of the major exploits of Heracles, the capture of Geryon's cattle. Geryon or Geryones was a winged monster with three heads, six arms, and six legs, the son of Chrysaor and the nymph Callirhoe. He lived in the far west, on the island of Erythea (probably Cadiz).

- 184 Tarshish river: the Guadalquivir.

- 185 the son of Zeus took his way: to reach Erythea Heracles commandeered the golden bowl in which, according to some poets (cf. Mimnermus 12), the Sun travels at night round Oceanus, the river that encircles the earth, to get back to the east.

- 181 Pholos: a Centaur with whom Heracles stayed as he passed through the mountains of Arcadia. The smell of the wine, never previously opened, attracted other, aggressive Centaurs, whom Heracles had to drive away.

Palinodes: many authors mention a 'Palinode' of Stesichorus in which he retracted what he had previously related about Helen—the usual story that she had eloped to Troy with Paris—and presented a version in which the gods removed her to Egypt for the duration of the Trojan War and duped Paris and everyone else with a phantom Helen. It was said that the goddess Helen had struck Stesichorus blind because of his first account, which did her no credit, and that on composing the Palinode he recovered his sight. One source states that there were two separate Palinodes.

Eriphyle: the poem presumably related how Alcmaeon killed his mother Eriphyle to avenge his father, the seer Amphiaraus, whom she had compelled to take part in a war that he knew would bring his death. Adrastus was Eriphyle's brother.

- 209 This fragment comes from an account of Telemachus' visit to Sparta to seek news of his father, adapted from book 15 of the Odyssey.

- 217 this bow: it was given so that Orestes could defend himself against the Furies when they pursued him because of his murder of his mother.

- 219 The dream was Clytemnestra's. The serpent represents Agamem-non, whom she killed (in one version) with an axe. The king that appeared 'out of that' (or perhaps 'after that') is presumably Orestes. Pleisthenes in some traditions replaced Atreus as Agamemnon's father. So the point may be that the legitimate king was to regain the throne from the usurper Aegisthus.

The Hunters of the Boar: heroes from many parts of Greece assembled to help Meleager hunt the mighty boar that the goddess Artemis sent to ravage the land of Calydon. The sons of Thestios were Meleager's uncles.

The Sons of Oedipus: Oedipus having laid curses upon his two sons Polynices and Eteocles, the seer Teiresias has prophesied to Jocasta that they will kill each other. She tries to prevent this by arranging that her sons should separate and rule Thebes in alternation. So Polynices departs. He went to Argos and there married the daughter of the king Adrastus. Later, when Eteocles proved unwilling to cede the Theban throne, Polynices tried with Adrastus' support to return and seize it by force. The two brothers duly killed one another in the battle.

223 deserters of their men: Tyndareos' three daughters were Timandra, who left her husband Echemos for another man; Clytemnestra, who was unfaithful to Agamemnon; and Helen, who deserted Menelaus when she sailed away with Paris.

P. Oxy. 3876 fr. 4 daughter of Thestios: Althaea. When the Calydonian Boar was killed, Meleager gave its hide to Atalanta, whom he fancied. His uncles, Althaea's brothers, took it away from her, and in a rage he killed them. The subject of the following fragment is obscure.

Ibycus

282 Polycrates: see Introduction, p. xvi.

285 sons of Moliona: Cteatus and Eurytus, the Siamese twins of Greek

Anacreon

347 your delightful neck: the addressee is a Thracian youth called Smerdies. For him and his hair see also fragments 366, 414, and 422.

348 Lethaeus: a tributary of the Maeander that flowed past the city of Magnesia. Artemis had a temple nearby.

388 'Koisyra's son': Koisyra was the proverbial grande dame.

415 kottabos: a popular party game, reputed to come from Sicily, in which drinkers slung the wine-dregs from their cups at a target.

Lasus

- 702 Clymenus' consort, the Maid: Persephone. Clymenus is a name for Hades, the lord of the dead.

Hipponax

- 3 Maia's son, Cyllene's sultan: Hermes, the protecting god of thieves. Cyllene is the mountain in Arcadia where he was born. 'Sultan' translates a Lydian word that Hipponax uses a number of times for comic-bombastic effect.
- 4a Amythaonid: i.e. a claimed descendant of the mythical seer Melampus, the son of Amythaon.
- 5 pelted with fig-branches: this and the five following fragments allude to an Ionian 'scapegoat' ritual in which, to purify the city, some friendless wretch was first given a good meal, then subjected to various indignities, driven out of the town, and (perhaps) put to death.
- 63 Myson: in response to an enquiry as to who was the wisest of men, the Delphic oracle unexpectedly named this obscure person. He was later counted as one of the Seven Sages.
- 72 Rhesus: a Thracian king who arrived at a late stage in the Trojan War to assist the Trojans, but was killed in a night commando raid. The story is told in book 10 of the Iliad.
- 78 this fellow: his penis. The narrator presumably gestured towards his own; possibly, like later comic actors, he wore a large artificial phallus.
- 92 in Lydian: the woman is using spells and other measures to treat the narrator for impotence. The transliteration of the Lydian phrase is uncertain, and our knowledge of the language insufficient to elucidate it.
- 104 the Thargelia: the festival that included the 'scapegoat' ritual. Pandora ('All-giver') is here a title of the Earth-goddess.
- 115 Salmydessos: a rocky, harbourless coast on the Black Sea, west of the Bosphorus, a region notorious for shipwrecks.
- 128 Tell me, O Muse: this fragment is a parody of the epic style.
- 129 Bendova's isle: the hero of the Odyssey spends time on the isle of Calypso; Hipponax substitutes 'Cypso', which has the indelicate meaning indicated by my rendering.

Anonymous Theognidea

- 692 to cheer your friends: I have tried to render a play in the Greek on Chaeron's name, which means 'man of joy'.

- 702 the Aeolid Sisyphus: see the note on Alcaeus 38. Rhadamanthys was a brother of Minos, and famed for his wisdom and justice.
- 715 Harpies: fearsome female wind-demons who carry people off for good. The two sons of Boreas, the North Wind, were also supernatural wind-spirits. According to one myth they pursued the Harpies and eventually caught and killed them.
- 764 this Median war: the poem was composed at a time when a Persian invasion threatened. The date depends on the identity of 'this town'. If it is an Ionian town, it might be as early as 540; if it is in mainland Greece, the reference is most likely to Xerxes' invasion in 480.
- 774 on Pelops' son Alcaethous' behalf: this refers to the foundation-myth of Megara. So in this case the Median threat can be fairly safely identified as that of the year 480. The poet may be Philiadas, known as a Megarian poet of that time.
- 843 when he that was higher comes to be below: a mock oracle in solemn style. It probably means 'when the drinker sinks to the floor'.
- 894 the clan of Cypselus: Cypselus and his son Periander were tyrants of Corinth from about 657 to 585. We cannot identify the historical setting of these verses. Cerinthus and the plain of Lelantum were in Euboea; the plain was the scene of repeated conflict in the early historical period.
- 1024 Tmolus: a mountain in Lydia.
- 1216 the Lethaeon Plain: see the note on Anacreon 348. But the reference here may be to the symbolic Plain of Lethe (Oblivion), situated in the world of the dead.
- 1229 a carcass of the sea: the poet refers in riddling fashion to a conch, a shell trumpet, being used to send a signal from one house to another.
- 1232 Because of you: Troy was destroyed because of Helen's passion for Paris, but it is not clear which of the stories about Theseus the poet had in mind. For Ajax see Alcaeus, fragment 298.
- 1288 Atalanta: in one version of the myth Atalanta held a spear as she raced against her suitors, and killed all who could not outdistance her. But the following lines show the myth employed with a different point, and they may be the work of a different poet.

Xenophanes

- 2 pentathlon: the ancient pentathlon consisted of discus-throwing, the long jump, the javelin, running, and wrestling.
- pankration*: a form of unarmed combat in which almost anything was allowed except for biting and eye-gouging.

- 7a Pythagoras was an (older?) contemporary of Xenophanes. His achievements and teachings are shrouded in legend, but this early anecdote presupposes that he believed in the transmigration of souls between human and animal bodies.

Simonides

- 507 That Ram was duly fleeced: referring to the defeat of a wrestler Krios, whose name meant 'ram'.
- 509 son of Alcmena: Heracles.
- 511 the man of Pyrrhus' line: the noble Thessalian family called the Aleuadaï, with whom Simonides was friendly, traced its descent from one Pyrrhus, perhaps identified with Achilles' son Neoptolemus.
- 515 daughters of storm-swift mares: a high-flown periphrasis for 'mules'. The poem celebrated a victory in a mule-cart race at Olympia won by Anaxilas, tyrant of Rhegium.
- 519 fr. 32 the goddess: Leto, mother of Apollo and Artemis.
- 531 Leonidas: the leader of the Spartans who died heroically defending the pass at Thermopylae in 480.
- 543 in the carved chest: when Danae, in spite of all her father's precautions, was impregnated by Zeus and gave birth to Perseus, she and the baby were put out to sea in a chest.
- 551 had I come earlier: the red sail mentioned in 550 was meant to be hoisted as a signal if Theseus returned to Athens successfully from his expedition against the Minotaur, to save Aegeus waiting for the ship to dock. Theseus forgot to hoist it, and his father, assuming the worst, threw himself off the Acropolis. 551 is apparently spoken to Aegeus by a messenger who arrives too late.
- 555 the Peleïades: the star-group known as the Pleiades or Peleïades (the latter form means 'doves') was identified with the seven nymphs who were Atlas' daughters.
- 595 their mortal ears: those of the Argonauts, who, like Odysseus, sailed by the Sirens' island. They were able to overcome the temptation to tarry because they had Orpheus with them, and his singing, described in the following fragment, was sweeter even than that of the Sirens.
- 577a Cassotis: the probable name of a spring at Delphi where the Muses had a shrine. Clio was the senior Muse.
- 581 Cleobulus: later considered one of the Seven Sages; here treated as the author of a famous epitaph for King Midas of Phrygia—otherwise ascribed to Homer—which declared that the bronze statue over the tomb would remain so long as fountains spring and tall trees grow,

so long as sun and bright moon rise and shine,
and rivers run, and sea-waves wash the shore.

587 fi-ire: Simonides spread the word for fire, pyr, over two or three musical notes, probably to imitate its flickering.

602 the empty-headed claim of boys: these lines are said to have been composed in criticism of a competition judge who had awarded a prize to the younger poet Pindar instead of to Simonides.

ELEGIES

3 Zetes and Kalais: the two supernatural sons of the North Wind, Boreas. The Athenians are said to have prayed to Boreas before the battle of Artemisium, and in response he roused the three-day storm which wrecked a good portion of the Persian navy.

10 O son of sea-nymph: Achilles, son of Thetis. This elegy began with a lengthy proemium addressed to the hero.

11 and by Menelaus' strength: the legendary king Menelaus, Agamemnon's brother, was worshipped at Sparta as a hero. Like the Tyndarids, Castor and Polydeuces, he was imagined still to have power to help his people, and images of all three were carried with the army.

the Iamid: Tisamenus, the army's official priest and diviner, claimed descent from the ancient seer Iamus.

13 Dorus: the ancestor of the Dorians. On the connection with Heracles' family see the notes on Tyrtaeus 2 and 19.

14 the river: the Asopus. This prophecy by Tisamenus before the battle of Plataea is recorded by Herodotus (9. 36).

19 the Chian said: the Chian is Homer, Chios being one of the chief claimants to the honour of having been his birthplace. The verse quoted is from the Iliad, 6. 146.

25 The stuff: snow, used for cooling wine. 'Buried alive' refers to its storage underground. Simonides is said to have improvised this elegant riddle on a hot summer evening when he saw others getting their wine chilled.

26 broad as it was: a similar story tells that Simonides came out with this verse (adapted from Iliad 14. 33) when he saw other guests being served with hare and himself being missed out.

92 Simonides rearranges the same words to make two verses in different metres. See Timocreon, elegiac/iambic fragment 10, for a rude comment in the same format.

Pratinas

- 708 What commotion is this?: Pratinas' chorus is indignant about a novel form of dithyramb—perhaps due to Lasus—characterized by greater elaboration of the aulos accompaniment.
- 712 Ionian Muse: a technical reference to musical modes called 'tense Ionian' and 'slack Ionian'.

Anonymous Party Songs

- 893 Harmodius and Aristogeiton: see Introduction, p. xix.
- 907 Leipsydriion: a place some miles to the north of Athens. In 513 BC a band of dissidents hostile to Hippias' regime, led by the Alcmeonid family, built themselves a fort there. It was besieged and taken by forces from the city. The song was presumably composed soon afterwards, and before the fall of Hippias in 510.

Telesilla

- 717 fleeing from Alpheus: the Alpheus was the principal river of the Peloponnese, flowing westward through Arcadia and Elis. According to a local myth, the river-god pursued the virgin goddess Artemis, but she evaded him.

Timocreon

- 727 This piece was probably composed in about 478. The men named are Spartans and Athenians who played leading roles in the battles of Salamis (480), Plataea, and Mycale (479). After Salamis, Themistocles had sailed about the Aegean with a fleet on his own initiative, demanding money with menaces from those islands that had collaborated with the Persians, and generally throwing his weight about.
- at the Isthmus*: the Greek commanders met there to decide which of them had earned the highest honours in the war. Themistocles apparently tried to win favour by laying on a banquet, but the gathering ended inconclusively.
- 729 About ten years later Themistocles was denounced for involvement in secret dealings with Persia, and Timocreon composed this gleeful song, of which 728 was the opening.
- 10 Cean blather: referring to Simonides' jeu d'esprit, elegiac fragment 92; see the note on it above.

Euenus

- 2 a foursome with three water-nymphs: in other words, one part of wine should be mixed with three of water.

- 8b the Melian sea: the island of Melos, from a Parian's viewpoint, marked the beginning of a dangerously exposed stretch of open sea.

Iambic Fragments

- 1 Syloson: younger brother of Polycrates, after whose death in 522 he was installed by Darius as puppet ruler of Samos. His misrule caused many to depart, leaving 'plenty of space'.

Elegiac Fragments

- 6 Kedon: an Athenian remembered for having made some sort of attempt to overthrow Hippias.
17 Aristomenes: remembered in Messenian tradition as the great hero of their second war against Sparta in the time of Tyrtaeus.

Melic Fragments

- 942 Polyhymnia: one of the Muses.
1004 the Tyndarid brothers: Castor and Polydeuces were particularly associated with saving sailors in peril on the sea. See Alcaeus' hymn to them, fragment 34.

Play Songs

- 861 We do not know the nature of this game, only that it was played at Tarentum.
875 This was the Pot game. One child sat in the middle and was the Pot. Another ran round the Pot anticlockwise, keeping one hand on the Pot's head. The others hit at him as he went round, while he tried to kick them. If he succeeded, the one kicked took his place. The first part of each verse was sung by the teasers, the second part by the orbiter.
876a Blind Man's Buff: one child, blindfolded, ran about reciting the first verse and trying to catch the rest, who belaboured him with papyrus lashes and answered with the second verse. Whoever he caught took his place.
876b Shine, sun, we love you: children clapped their hands and chanted this verse if a cloud passed over the sun.
876c Torty-tortoise: a girls' game. One, the Tortoise, sat in the middle, while the others ran round her in a circle and questioned her. At the word 'JUMPED' she leapt up to catch whoever was nearest at that moment.

Ritual Songs

- 848 the swallow is here: a children's begging-chant from Rhodes. On a day in spring the children would carry a (model?) swallow with them and go collecting from door to door with this 'trick or treat' manifesto. Similar things are known to have existed elsewhere in Greece, and parallels are found in other parts of Europe.
- 851a make way for the god: a huge wooden phallus, borne into the theatre, perhaps on Delos, by men wearing costumes that included 'masks of drunken men'.
- 854 Rain, dear Zeus, rain: an Athenian prayer.
- 856 Come along now, all you sons: chanted at Spartan military parades, or perhaps when actually on the way to battle.
- 862 A holy boy is born: a proclamation made during the nocturnal rites at the Eleusinian Mysteries. Brimo and Brimos are esoteric cult names for Demeter and Plutus (= Wealth, embodied in the new corn). Brim- suggests 'mighty'.
- 868 To Athens let us go: sung by dancing girls of the Bottiaioi, a Macedonian people, at a certain sacrifice.
- 870 Young, valiant warriors we used to be: these lines were recited respectively by groups of old men, able-bodied men, and boys on parade at a Spartan festival.
- 871 Come to the festival, O Dionysus: sung by women of Elis. Dionysus is identified with the bull to be sacrificed—a bull 'worthy' of the god and the occasion.
- 872 Put off our old age till later: at Sparta there was a cult of 'Aphrodite who postpones old age'. The verse may come from there.
- 877 O Maiden: Persephone. The bridge was one crossed by those going from Athens to Eleusis for the celebration of the Mysteries. The triple ploughing of fallow land in the course of the spring and summer made it fully ready for sowing in the autumn.
- 879 (1) A call and response at the Athenian Lenaea festival. (2) A call and response at Athenian libations. (3) A call following a libation.
- 881b Out you go, croaky crow: chanted at weddings; translation and interpretation doubtful.
- 882 Take good fortune: the conclusion of another collecting-song, sung in the villages round Syracuse by men wearing horns and garlands. They carried bags of mixed seeds and skins full of wine, from which they made token offerings on behalf of those they encountered. 'The goddess' is Artemis.

GREEK LYRIC POETRY

Translated with Introduction and Notes
by M. L. West

You came, and I needed you,
You cooled the fever of longing that racked my heart.
(Sappho)

The Greek lyric, elegiac, and iambic poets of the two centuries from 650 to 450 BC—Archilochus and Alcman, Sappho and Mimnermus, Anacreon, Simonides, and many others—produced some of the finest poetry of antiquity: perfect in form, spontaneous in expression, reflecting all the joys and anxieties of their personal lives and of the societies in which they lived.

This new poetic translation by a leading expert captures both the nuances of meaning and the whole spirit of the poetry as never before. It is not merely a selection but covers all the surviving poems and intelligible fragments, apart from the works of Pindar and Bacchylides, and it includes a number of pieces not previously translated.
